ALLITERATION in HORACE.

The word 'alliteration' is a modern term. According to Wölfflin¹ and Volkmann², it was first used by Johannes Jovianus Pontanus, an Italian humanist of the fifteenth century. Of more modern scholars Victorius (var.lect.27) chose the name $\pi\alpha\rho'\iota\sigma\omega\sigma\iota\varsigma$, Brockhusius $\pi\alpha\rho\text{-}\eta\chi\eta\sigma\iota\varsigma$, Gifanio geminatio.

Although the name 'alliteration' is so modern, it does not follow that the figure is new, for the frequency of its occurrence in the earliest Latin poets shows plainly that it was consciously used as a figure of speech. The early Latin grammarians recognised this figure both in their purely grammatical treatises and also in their commentaries on various authors. They generally called it $\pi\alpha\rho'\epsilon\mu\omicron\iota\omicron\nu$ and said much the same things about it, usually illustrating their meaning by quotations from Ennius or Virgil, Marx (Lucili Carmina Ip.161) gives a number of examples of alliteration "quam parhomoeon sive homoeoprophoron rectius nomines". Since, however, the term 'alliteration' has been commonly accepted, it will be used in this paper.

The Auctor ad Herennium,³ without giving the figure a name, condemns "eiusdem litterae nimiam adsiduitatem, cui vitio versus hic erit exemplo:- nam (hic) nihil prohibet in vitiis alienis exemplis uti- 'O Tite tute Tati tibi tanta tyranna tulisti (Ennius An.109 ed. Vahlen) et huiusdem poetae: Umquam quicquam cuquam quod ei conveniat, neget' (En. Sc. 422). Donatus (Grammatici Latini, Keil IV 398) defines parhomoeon thus: "parhomoeon est, cum ab isdem litteris diversa verba sumuntur: 'O Tite tute Tati tibi tanta tyranne tulisti.' (En. An. 109 ed. Vahlen), and Pompeius in his commentary on Donatus (Keil G.L.V. 303) says: parhomoeon est, quotiens ab isdem litteris diversa verba sequuntur quo modo illud habes apud Vergilium 'Sola mihi tales casus Cassandra canebat' (Aen. III. 183). At ipsa littera incohavit plurimas partis orationis. Quale ist illud, 'longo sale saxa sonabant' (Ver. Aen. V. 866). Antiqui integros versus ita faciebant ut, 'O Tite tute Tati tibi tanta tyranne tulisti': versus est Ennianus" (En. An. 109 ed. Vahlen). Marius Plotius (Keil G.L. VI. 458-459) says: "Parhomoeon est, cum multorum verborum diversorum initia similibus litteris proferuntur ut 'casus Cassandra canebat' (Ver. Aen. III. 183) et illud 'Clitipho consilia consequi consimilia' " (Ter. Heaut. 208). Charisius

(M. Tulli Ciceronis Scripta quae manserunt omnia. Recognovit C. F. W. Mueller. Pars I. Opera Rhetorica recognovit Gulielmus Friedrich. Teubner Leipzig 1884).

(Keil G.L.I.282) says: "parhomoeon est cum verba omnia similiter incipiunt ut, 'O Tite tute Tati tibi tanta tyranne tulisti' "(En.An.109 ed.Vahlen) and Diomedes (Keil G.L.I.446-447): de parhomoeon: Parhomoeon est, cum verba vel nomina paululum inflexa et tamen prope similia superioribus inferuntur, ut 'multa vir virtus animo multusque recursat gentis honos' (Ver.Aen.IV.3). Et aliter parhomoeon fit, cum verba similiter incipiunt, ut 'machina multa minax minatur maxima muris' "(En.An.621 ed.Vahlen). Martianus Capella (pp.169-171 ed. Eyssenhardt) gives special names to the repetition of certain letters, as Iotacismus(Iunio Iuno Iovis iure irascitur), Labdacismus(sol et luna luce lucent alba leni lactea), Polysigma (Sogia in golaria goleas garciebat guas), and gives the figure illustrated by the Auctor ad Herennium the name homoeoprophoron. To this list of special names Mytacismus should be added(mammam ipsam amo quaisi meam animam). Isidor(orig.I.35 par. 14) takes the name paromoeon from Donatus and also the quotation from Ennius and remarks that Virgil never lets the alliteration extend through the whole line but puts it at the beginning or in the middle or at the end.

These definitions all seem very simple, but they are also very general, and when it comes to a particular case it is sometimes difficult to tell whether it should be classed as alliteration, especially in Horace where we have extremely few instances of such striking alliteration as that in the lines so frequently quoted from Ennius. From these definitions it is hard to decide whether there is any limitation as to the parts of speech in alliteration, whether nouns, verbs, prepositions, pronouns etc. may be component parts of it. Is any such juxtaposition of words beginning with the same letter alliteration, or must the juxtaposition be the result of conscious effort on the part of the author? Must the alliterative words be immediately consecutive, or may they be separated by one or more words? If the alliteration is in poetry must the alliterative words be in the same line, or may they be the last of one line and the first of the next? Is alliteration more a matter of hearing or of seeing, that is to say, for example, will a consonant i alliterate with a vowel i or only with a consonant i etc? Must the members of the alliteration be in a particular grammatical relation, or is one relation more frequent or more effective than another? In what does alliteration of compound words consist, in the alliteration of the prefixes or of the bases or of the two combined?

Ebrard begins his treatise: „Die Alliteration dient in der lateinischen wie in vielen anderen Sprachen als Mittel, um gewissen Ideenassoziationen und Begriffsformen eine in das Ohr fallende und damit dem Verständnis sich einschmeichelnde oder sich ihm aufdrängende Wirkung zu verleihen. Was ist Alliteration? Man versteht darunter Gleichklang im Anlaut, also eine Verbindung von Wörtern, welche mit demselben Laut (oder mit denselben Lauten) beginnen“.

Otto Raebel in his dissertation

"De Usu Adnominationis Apud Romanorum Poetas Comicos" says:

"Poetas, cum animos hominum in audiendis poematibus non materia, de qua agitur, sed forma, in quam res includuntur, maxime capi solere non ignorent, mirum non est id imprimis studere, ut aures nostras, quibus quidem indicamus praecipus, quid placeat quid non, ante omnia concilient atque permulceant. Neque vero quidquam iucundius auribus nostris accidit quam sonus vocabulorum et numerus.-----In exemplis alliterationum considerandis non multum interest quid vocabula significant, aut quomodo inter se cohaereant.-----Alliteratio, ut tribus verbis comprehendam, est lusus litterarum.

In his article "Über die allitterierenden Verbindungen der lateinischen Sprache" Wölfflin says (page 7): "Wir interpretieren aber auch noch unsern Titel so, dass wir nur von der Verbindung oder Gegenüberstellung gleicher Redeteile, also von syntactisch co-ordinierten Gliedern sprechen, und zwar sind das meist Nomina, vorwiegend Substantiva, dann auch Adiectiva, beziehungsweise Adverbia, zum kleinsten Bruchteile Verba wie vir valeo, sentire sapere, laedere laudare, antiquo abroque, pollens potensque, nur selten Partikeln wie semel saepius, satis superque, praeter propter (vgl. ganz und gar, samt und sonders). Verbindungen ungleicher Redeteile wie noxam nocere, occisione occidi, facile factu, usux gehören zu den Etymologischen Figuren,----- andere aber, wie firme fidus, vagi venti, vi victa vis,gehen so ins Regellose und Zufällige,dass sie nicht mehr systematisch zusammengefasst werden können. Nachdem einmal diese Grenze gezogen ist,dürfen wir sie nicht verletzen,auch wo wir an bewusste Anwendung der Alliteration glauben". That is to say, he treats only alliteration of like parts of speech co-ordinately joined,but he does not deny the existence of other alliteration. Marx (Lucili Carmina I.Index 161) gives examples of alliteration of different parts of speech or of the same part not co-ordinately joined,e.g. amputat ambo(281), dentes-----discutio (337), noctis nigrore (209); so also Ignaz Schneider (De alliterationis apud T. Lucretium Carum usu a. vi):- magni mali fit copia circum(Lucr. De Rerum Natura 6,829), suavius placet et pollere videtur (ib. 5. 1413), planum facere ac probare(ib. 2. 934) etc. Moreover,none of the grammarians quoted cite as examples of alliteration lines in which the alliterative words are like parts of speech coöordinately joined. Raebel puts it clearly when he says,in the passage already quoted from his dissertation „De usu adnominationis apud Romanorum poetas comicos": "in exemplis alliterationum considerandis non multum interest, quid vocabula signifient, aut quomodo inter se cohaereant.-----

--Alliteratio-----est lusus litterarum". I think,therefore, that we may say that any parts of speech in any form may be joined in alliteration,but that,since pronouns,interjections,prepositions,copulas,and conjunctions are comparatively unimportant and unemphatic, and the choice with regard to them is relatively limited, these words are not likely to combine with just one other word into effective alliteration and in the citations such instances as quo quisque (Horace S. II.1. 50), est esse (S.I. 10. 63), tibi tum (S.I.2.97) will not be included.

Must alliteration be the result of conscious effort or may it be accidental? Wölfflin says (Zur Alliteration, Ar.f.lat.Lex.usu IX.568): Eine Alliteration kann nur Eindruck machen, wenn sie gefunden ist und freier Wahl entspringt, nicht wenn sie sich unausweichlich von selbst ergibt und daher jedem in die Hände fällt, wie etwa tibia und tuba, toga und tunica, more maiorum. Man muss das nach unserem Ermessen bei einer allitterierenden Verbindung nachweisen, dass man anders hätte sagen können aber die allitterierende aus Wohlklangs- oder Rücksichten vorgezogen habe". It seems to me that the fact that an expression "jedem in die Hände fällt" does not render the expression any less alliterative nor even necessarily less effective. It may be, indeed, that the expression has become so general simply because it is alliterative and is used for the effect of alliteration rather than for the meaning. Take, for instance, the very case cited by Wölfflin above: toga and tunica, and tibia and tuba and the many common English expressions like kith and kin, hearth and home, wit and wisdom, weak as a woman, heart and hand, head and heel, house and home etc. Surely no one will say that this alliteration is not effective because it is so common. Sometimes, however, the common use of an alliterative expression may make it less effective as, for instance, fertile fields. The use here is much the same as with other figures of speech. An expression as common as the "foot of the mountain" is not felt as a figure of speech, but this does not in any way alter the fact that the expression is figurative. I think that it is generally rather presumptuous to assert that a poet could not have expressed his thought in any other words or order than that which he used. He would always, of course, use the one that seemed most effective, that might be a very common expression or it might be very unusual. Alliteration is then not necessarily the result of conscious effort so much as the working out of the sense of the fitness of things. It is not to be sought after or avoided, but perhaps conscious and unusual alliteration is most effective.

As to the order of words in alliteration we may say that the alliteration is more striking if the members of it follow each other immediately or are separated only by unemphatic words. The alliterative words may be in different lines if they follow each other closely, provided there is no noticeable break in the thought.

Is alliteration more a matter of seeing or of hearing? Of hearing, surely, for we find the most alliteration in the early poets and prose writers who were accustomed to read their productions aloud to their friends. Therefore we shall not give as alliterative words beginning with a vowel i or u and those beginning with the consonant, but on the other hand those with c with q and ch.

One other question should be mentioned here, namely, in what does alliteration of compounds consist? If we have a compound and a simple word, will the prefix or the base of the compound alliterate with the simple word? Marx in his Lucilius gives examples in which the prefix alliterates with the simple word, e.g., pestem permitiemque (Luc. 1.77), protulit et pretio ingenti dat primitus paucos (ib. 199), dentes-----discutio (ib. 337), res ipsa ac ratio ipsa refellat (ib. 350), and he also cites places where the prefix of one compound alliterates with the prefix of another but their bases do not alliterate, e.g., incita atque internecionem (ib. 101), subicit et suffert (ib. 509). He does not quote any lines in which the base of one word alliterates with that of another or with a simple word.

Marius Flotius as quoted above gives us a line from Terence (Heaut. 208): Clitipho consilia consequi consimilia in which all the compounds have both prefixes and bases which are respectively alliterative. Only the prefixes, however, alliterate with the first word 'Clitipho'.

Ignaz Schneider¹ quotes examples of alliteration of compounds in which the prefix and a simple word alliterate: diffidere dictis(Lucre. De Rerum Natura I.267), pectore perfixo(ib.VI.392),pontique profunda(ib.V.417); of alliteration of the base of a compound and a simple word: perfusus frigore leti(ib.IV. 921),parte reparcent (ib.I.667),multis communia (ib.I.824); of alliteration of prefix and prefix: disturbans dissoluensque(ib.I.567), succidet et salso suffudit gurgite fossas(ib.V.482),consuetudo concinnat amorem(ib.IV.1275); of alliteration of prefix and prefix and base and base: inclamet magis et voce ingrepet acri(ib.III.952),implicitus quoque possis inquepeditus(ib.IV.1141),retroque recellit et recipit(ib.VI.573).

By the words "man sollte glauben, deliciae allitteriere mit d, weil das Verbum lacere(vgl. inlicio pellicio) abgestorben war, und doch allitteriert es viel häufiger mit l", Wölfflin(Zur Allitteration, Ar.f.lat.Lex.usw.IX.570) seems to presuppose a rule that, if the members of a compound exist separately as words, the base will alliterate with some other word, otherwise the prefix, but in his further illustrations he does not seem to carry this out. In this paper the plan of Ignaz Schneider will be followed.

Questions that this paper will attempt to answer are: Does Horace show a preference for alliteration of any particular letter or letters? If so, is this due to the fact that a proportionately large number of the words of his vocabulary begin with this letter or these letters? Does he show a preference for any particular syntactical relation between the members of alliterative expressions? If so, what relation? Does he use alliteration more in one kind of metre than in another? Does he use alliteration more in one part of the line than in another? Is alliteration used in connection with other rhetorical figures such as assonance, rhyme, onomatopoeia, or etymological figure?

First a complete list of examples of alliteration in Horace will be given in alphabetical order and in the order Carmina, abbreviated Car., Carmen Saeculare, abbreviated C.S., Epodes, abbreviated Ep., Sermones, abbreviated S., Epistulae, abbreviated Epp., and Ars Poetica, abbreviated A.P. In this first list the full line will be quoted and the alliterative letter underlined. In case there is alliteration of more than one letter in the same line, the line will be quoted for each alliteration and the alliteration of the other letter or letters referred to, as, for instance, when Car. I. 29. 11 is quoted under p, it will be given thus: *pronus relabi posse rivos (Car. I. 29. 11) v. r.*

Now that we have all of the instances of alliteration in Horace before us we can answer the first two questions that this paper was to answer, namely; "Does Horace show a preference for alliteration of any particular letter or letters?" and, "If so, is this because a proportionately large number of the words of his vocabulary begins with this letter or these letters?" We find that there were one hundred and fourteen cases of alliteration of the letter 'a', five of 'b', three hundred and sixty-seven of 'c', one hundred and eight of 'd', twelve of 'e', seventy-three of 'f', three of 'g', four of 'h', forty-three of 'i', forty-six of 'l', one hundred and fifty-seven of 'm', thirty-four of 'n', twenty-eight of 'o', three hundred and eighty-four of 'p', forty-four of 'r', one hundred and seventy-two of 's', seventy of 't', and one hundred and forty-one of 'u'. On the other hand, in the first ten odes of book one, the vocabulary of which may be taken as fairly representative of the vocabulary of Horace as a whole, we find one hundred and seven words beginning with 'a', nine with 'b', one hundred and forty-three with 'c', seventy-seven with 'd', sixty with 'e', sixty with 'f', twenty-eight with 'g', twenty-three with 'h', seventy-eight with 'i', forty-six with 'l', eighty-one with 'm', ninety-one with 'n', thirty with 'o', one hundred and twenty-eight with 'p', forty-three with 'r', one hundred and fourteen with 's', ninety-five with 't', and eighty-seven with 'u'. From this it will be seen that more words begin with 'c', 'p', and 's' than with any other letters and that these three letters also hold first place in alliteration. The rank of the other letters is not the same for both words and alliteration, and yet 'b', 'h', and 'g' hold the lowest places in both, not, however, in the same order. These facts would lead us to think that most of Horace's alliteration was more or less accidental and was largely due to his vocabulary.

The next question we shall try to answer is, "Does he show a preference for any particular syntactical relations between the members of the alliterative expressions?" In this classification only those cases of alliteration will be given which contain one of the following relations: like parts co-ordinately joined, subject and verb, verb and direct object, verb and indirect object, noun and attributive, verb and adverb, and verb and dependent infinitive. To give all relations between nouns and adjectives, adverbs and adjectives, etc., would lead to endless classifications of little or no value. Therefore only the more fundamental relations are classified here.

From these lists it will be seen that by far the largest number of the classified examples are nouns and their attributes; next to these rank words co-Ordinately joined and verb and direct object, then subject and verb, verb and dependent infinitive, verb and adverb, and verb and indirect object. Less than one-third of the cases of alliteration could be classified in these simple syntactical classifications.

We find more alliteration in the dactylic hexameter of Horace than in his other metres. This is probably not due to the metre so much as to the fact that the 'Sermones' and 'Epistulae' are by nature of less polished style than the 'Carmina! For this reason Horace would naturally use here one of the oldest figures and one very commonly used in everyday life.

We find a great number of instances where the alliteration is in the first part of the line only and also a great number in which the alliteration stands at the end, but an immensely larger number in which the alliteration is not confined to any one part of the line.

The figure most frequently used in connection with alliteration is assonance, next in order would be etymological figure and onomatopoeia; last, and perhaps not at all as a conscious figure of speech, would be rhyme.

The statement has been frequently made that Horace used very little alliteration, but from the lists given above it can be seen that he uses much more of it than is commonly supposed. He does not use it to such an extent as Ennius, it is true, but he uses it more effectively, giving the reader the pleasure of the alliteration without detracting from the meaning. This certainly is the legitimate use of alliteration or any other figure of speech, for whenever a figure of speech is used in such a way as to draw all attention to itself, it ceases to be valuable.
