Shānti Dūta: Harbinger of Peace

Compiled by Dr. Murari L. Nagar

Scholars differ as to the meaning and significance of the constituent elements of the capital of the Aśoka column at Sāmāth. One scholar, B. Majumdar, believes the so-called "bell" is not really a bell, but an inverted lotus with sixteen petals. He goes into great detail about the statue, which is a harbinger of peace and symbol of the Republic of India.

"The capital is really the symbolic representation of the great religious event of the Buddha's appearance and the promulgation of his wonderful dharma, which was first preached in Sāmāth. Upon the 'bell-shaped' lotus there is an abacus having four figures, namely an elephant, a bull, a galloping horse and a lion, each separated from the other by a disc or

Introducing Om Shānti

It was the first and only peaceful revolution in recorded history. It showed the world India is not willing to compromise her principles, which happen to be the same ones champions of the American Revolution held sacred: freedom and self-sufficiency.

There is one principle, however, that colonial freedom fighters failed to understand: nonviolence. Our ideologies are the same, but our cultures are different. The concept of self-sacrifice is foreign to most Americans.

India's victory 50 years ago is the best example of what can be accomplished through peaceful action. We must learn to understand and respect the principle of peace (shānti).

The only way to universal peace is through understanding. One goal of Om Shānti is to dispel the myth that there are cultural barriers preventing Indians and Americans from living in unity. In Truth, All is indeed One.

The four wheels with twenty-four spokes represent the Dharmachakra (Wheel of the Law) that the Buddha set rolling to the four quarters of the globe. The twenty-four spokes that sustain the Wheel stand for the twenty-four (later reduced to four) modes of principal causal relations held in the Buddhist philosophy.

"Next, the top of the capital. It is surmounted by four lions set back to back with gaping mouth, as if in the very act of roaring. They may, therefore, be taken as representing monks proclaiming the glories of the Buddha and his teachings to the four cardinal points.

"The Wheel which originally adorned the capital as a crowning feature consisted of thirty-two spokes, symbolizing the Great Buddha himself, the very embodiment of his own dharmaśarfa, having thirty-two chief signs of the Great Superman."

The newly established World Association of Vedic Studies (WAVES) will be open to all those interested in “scuba-diving” through the vast, mysterious pool of information provided us by the ancient Vedas and other ancient Indian texts. WAVES will dedicate its studies to the literature, philosophy, philology, linguistics, ritual, archaeo-astronomy, yoga and science of the Vedas.

The association hopes to publish a peer-reviewed research journal on Vedic and ancient Indian studies. WAVES also plans to hold a biennial conference beginning in August 1998. Forming research and study circles in various Vedic disciplines is another goal of the organization.

The idea for WAVES developed out of the International Conference on Indus-Sarasvati Age and Ancient India. The conference was held in Atlanta, Ga., in October 1996. Over 300 participants from Austria, Belgium, Canada, the Caribbean, India, Italy, Nepal, the Netherlands, Mauritius, Mexico, Surinam, the United Kingdom and the United States attended. Prominent archaeologists, historians, philosophers, political scientists, theologians, Sanskritists, Vedic scholars, scientists, engineers, academics and medical specialists presented 60 papers at the conference. The participants were so impressed with the quality of the presentations that several decided to form an academic organization to hold similar conferences and provide new forums for Vedic studies.

Chair of the steering committee is Dr. Bhu Dev Sharma, professor and chair of the department of mathematics at Xavier University of Louisiana. Other members of the committee include Dr. Shiva G. Bajpai, professor of history and director of the center for Asian studies at California State University at Northridge; Dr. Deen Bandhu Chandora, M.D., from Atlanta, Georgia; David Frawley, American Institute of Vedic Studies; and Dr. Subhash Kak, professor, department of electrical/computer engineering at Louisiana State University.

India: “The one land all men desire to see”
Mark Twain’s views of India from Following the Equator

Compiled by
Ramesh Khanna, MD

“This is indeed India! The land of dreams and romance, of fabulous wealth and fabulous poverty, of splendor and rags, of palaces and hovels, of famine and pestilence, of genii and giants and Aladdin lamps, of tigers and elephants, the cobra and the jungle, the country of a hundred nations and a hundred tongues, of a thousand religions and two million gods, cradle of the human race, birthplace of human speech, mother of history, grand mother of legend, to pay his growing debt. The lecture tour provided him some money, while a look at the world provided him with the material for Following the Equator, Twain's final travel book. A deft humorist, masterful satirist, great novelist, memorable travel writer and gifted essayist, Twain went on to become one of America’s most popular writers.

great-grandmother of tradition, whose yesterdays bear date with the mouldering antiquities of the rest of the nations - the one sole country under the sun that is endowed with an imperishable interest for alien prince and alien peasant, for lettered and ignorant, wise and fool, rich and poor, bond and free, the one land that all men desire to see, and having seen once, by even a glimpse, would not give that glimpse for the shows of all the rest of the globe combined.”

These are the words of Mark Twain, who, along with his wife Olivia and their daughter Clara, visited India in 1896 during a round-the-world lecture tour. For several years, Twain had undergone a series of financial setbacks. He was forced to embark on a world-wide lecture tour to raise money first civilization; she had the first accumulation of material wealth; she was populous with deep thinkers and subtle intellects; she had mines, and woods, and a fruitful soil. It would seem as if she should have kept the lead, and should be today not the meek dependent of an alien master, but mistress of the world, and delivering law and command to every tribe and nation in it. But, in truth, there was never any possibility of such supremacy for her. If there had been but one India and one language - but there were eighty of them! Where there are eighty nations and several hundred governments, fighting and quarreling

On India

“There is only one India! It is the only country that has a monopoly of grand and imposing specialities. When another country has a remarkable thing, it cannot have it all to itself; some other country has a duplicate. But India - that is different. Its marvels are its own; the patents cannot be infringed; imitations are not always possible. And think of the size of them, the majesty of them, the weird and outlandish character of the most of them!

“It takes eighty nations, speaking eighty languages, to people her, and they number three hundred million.

“India had the start of the whole world in the beginning of things. She had the

On India

On arrival in Bombay on January 20, 1896, Twain wrote, “A bewitching place, a bewildering place, an enchanting place...” In retrospect a year later, while working on the book “Following the Equator,” he wrote, “even now, after the lapse of a year, the delirium (of) those days in Bombay has not left me, and I hope never will.”

On visit to Benares, Twain exclaimed, “Yes, the city of Benares is in effect just a big church, a religious hive whose very cell is a temple, a shrine or a mosque; and whose every conceivable earthly and heavenly good is procurable under one roof, so to speak ... a sort of Army and Navy store, theologically stocked.”

Fascinated by the color and picturesqueness in Jaipur, Twain said, “This one is not like any other that we saw. It is shut up in a lofty turreted wall; the main body of it is divided into six parts by perfectly straight streets that are more than a hundred feet wide; the blocks of houses exhibit a long frontage of the most taking architectural quaintnesses, the straight lines being broken everywhere by pretty little balconies, pillared and highly ornamented, and other cunning and cozy and inviting perches and projections, and the whole of them have the soft rich tint of strawberry ice-cream. One cannot look down the far stretch of the chief street and persuade himself that these are real houses, and that it is all out of doors - the impression that it is an unreality, a picture, a scene in a theater, is only one that will take hold.

“Then the wide street itself, away down and down and down into the distance, was alive with gorgeously-clothed people - not still, but moving, swaying, drifting, eddying, a delirious display of all colors, and all shades of color: delicate, lovely, pale, soft, strong, stunning, vivid, brilliant, a sort of storm of sweet-pea blossoms passing on the wings of a hurricane, and presently, through this storm of color, came swaying and swinging the majestic elephants, clothed in their Sunday best of gaudiness, and the long procession of fanciful trucks freighted with their groups of curious and costly images, and then the long rearguard of safety camels, with their picturesque riders. For color, and picturesqueness, and novelty, and outlandishness, and sustained interest and fascination, it was the most satisfying show I had ever seen, and I suppose I shall not have the privilege of looking upon its like again.”

The plight of servants troubled Mark Twain when he was in Allahabad, the “City of God.” He translated it as “Godville.”

“I was up at dawn, the next morning. In India the tourist’s servant does not sleep in a room in the hotel, but rolls himself up head and ears in his blanket and stretches himself on the veranda, across the front of his master’s door, and spends the night there. I don’t believe anybody’s servant occupies a room. Apparently, the bungalow servants sleep on the veranda; it is roomy, and goes all around the house. I speak of the men-servants; I saw none of the other sex. I think there are none, except child-nurses. I was up at dawn, and walked around the veranda, past the rows of sleepers. In front of door a Hindoo servant was squatting, waiting for his master to call him. He had polished the yellow shoes and placed them by the door, and now he had nothing to do but wait. It was freezing cold, but there he was, as motionless as a sculptured image, and as patient. It troubled me. I wanted to say to him, ‘Don’t crouch there like that and freeze; nobody requires it of you; stir around and get warm.’ But I hadn’t the words. I thought of saying ‘jeluly jow,’ but I couldn’t remember what it meant, so I didn’t say it. I knew another phrase, but it wouldn’t come to my mind. I moved on, purposing to dismiss him from my thoughts, but his bare legs and bare feet kept him there. They kept drawing me back from the sunny side to a point whence I could see him. At the end of an hour he had not changed his attitude in the least degree. It was a curious and impressive exhibition of meekness and patience, or fortitude or indifference, I did not know which. But it worried me, and it was spoiling my morning. In fact, it spoiled two hours of it thoroughly. I quitted this vicinity then and left him to punish himself as much as he might want to. But up to that time, the man had not changed his attitude a hair. He will always remain with me, I suppose; his figure never grows vague in my memory. Whenever I read of Indian resignation, Indian patience under wrongs, hardships, and misfortunes, he comes before me. He Twain blends whimsical anecdotes, sharp-eyed commentary and serious social critique. The Taj Mahal induces an interesting reverie. Twain notes, "I had read a great deal too much about it. I saw it in the daytime, I saw it in the moonlight, I saw it near at hand, I saw it from a distance; and I know all the time, that of its kind it was the wonder of the world, with no competitor now and no possible future competitor; and yet, it was not my Taj. My Taj had been built by excitable literary people; it was solidly lodged in my head, and I could not blast it out.

"The Taj represented man's supremest possibility in the creation of grace and beauty and exquisiteness and splendor, just as the ice-storm represents the Nature's supremest possibility in the combination of those same qualities. I do not know how long ago that idea was bred into me, but I know that I cannot remember back to a time when the thought of either of these symbols of gracious and unapproachable perfection did not at once suggest the other. If I thought of the ice-storm, the Taj rose before me divinely beautiful; if I thought of the Taj, with its encrustings and inlayings of jewels, the vision of the ice-storm rose. And so, to me, all these years, the Taj has had no rival among the temples and palaces of men, none that even remotely approached it - it was man's architectural ice-storm."

SPIRIT STONES of Southern India

I was driving down the highway when a crude wooden cross caught my eye. At first, I thought someone must have hit an animal on the road and buried it there. However, when I talked to Bill Noble, a geography professor at the University of Missouri-Columbia, he told me it is highway patrol policy in some western states, such as Montana and Wyoming, to mark the spots where fatal accidents occur. Noble also said he has seen similar markers on mountain roads in South America. This just goes to show, something that might initially seem to be a peculiarity of a certain region might have worldwide roots. Although it may be nothing more than policy in America, some tribal people in southern India believe a person’s soul remains in a certain spot after death. When a tribal woman becomes pregnant, a stone, or churinga, is selected for her unborn child’s spirit, which attaches itself to this “spirit stone” and stays with it even after death.

The Arunta tribe of Australia utilize sacred caves and rock shelters to hold a churinga for each female and male member of the tribe, according to Spencer and Gillen’s The Native Tribes of Central Australia, 1899. A churinga is composed of stone or wood and is often incised with decorative motifs. Upon the death of any member, the related spirit of the person is believed to be conjoined with his or her churinga. Spirits eventually wander away, and pregnancy in a female occurs when a spirit enters her womb. Thus, there is a primitive and charming concept related to the transmigration of spirits.

Although there is no counterpart of this belief system in India, some of the tribal people of southern India place spirit stones in the open, in dolmens (table-like tombs), in above-surface cists or in simply constructed temples. Spirit stones were once invariably water-smoothened stones from stream beds, but among tribal people who have not abandoned the cult practice, there is now a tendency to deposit a sculptured stone instead. The common belief is that the spirit of a deceased person will be bound to the spirit stone for a while, but then go to a supernatural abode and not return to earth for another existence.

So far, our research of the virtually unknown spirit stone cult has shown the Nilgiri Hills of Tamil Nadu and adjacent areas to have the strongest surviving elements of the cult. Both the Irukas and Kurumbas of the Nilgiris tend to believe in spirit stones, as do the Bettu Kurumbas and Kasubas who inhabit the Mysore Ditch just to the north of the Nilgiris. The Irukas, Uralis, and Damarambals are neighboring tribes in the same region. Both groups believe they were brought to the present area by an ancient people, perhaps from the plains northwest of the Nilgiris.

“The is it too outrageous to suggest that the ancestors of the Arunta and other Australian aborigines had, perhaps, some cultural ways in common with Australoid inhabitants of southern India?”
- William A. Noble

Shevroyes no longer deposit spirit stones for their dead, dolmens with ancestral spirit stones still stand in nearby jungle. The Mahal Arayans, living on the lower western slopes of the High Range in Kerala, were once unique in constructing small above-surface stone cists, each for a single spirit stone.

Is it too outrageous to suggest that the ancestors of the Arunta and other Australian aborigines had, perhaps, some cultural ways in common with Australoid inhabitants of southern India? Why are such distant people associated with deposited objects believed to hold the spirits of the departed for some time? Some dolmens in southern India represent a very ancient way to provide shelter for sacred spirit stones.

We know that the Bettu Kurumbas leave a spirit stone on the ground, near a tree, during the funeral. One Iruka site has spirit stones piled together on the ground. With the exception of a Kurumba temple with a pyramidal thatched roof and a rectangular thatched temple, which has long been in ruins, Kurumba spirit stones are generally kept in dolmens. Although the Irukas often live close to Kurumbas, they have only small and dolmen-like temples with piled stone walls and flat roofs, or thatched temples with hipped roofs to house their spirit stones.

DID YOU EVER NOTICE?

While the Dharmachakra, or Wheel of Law, on the flag of independent India has 24 spokes, the circle in the crest of Missouri’s state flag is lined with 24 stars.

The national flag of India is tri-color (saffron, white and green). In the center of the white band, there is a wheel in navy blue. The design of the wheel is drawn from the chakra appearing on the Sarnath Lion Capital of Asoka. Various sages, scholars and Pāṇḍits have given different meanings to each of the chakra’s 24 spokes.

Buddhist philosophy relates the 24 spokes to the 24 modes of condition. Paccaya means “condition” and stands for something upon which something else, the “conditioned thing,” is dependent.
