THE SOCIAL MEDIA QUESTION:
UNDERSTANDING THE CONTENT PEOPLE READ AND SHARE ON TWITTER

ABSTRACT

People use online platforms such as Twitter and Facebook to find and share news that matters to them. This quantitative study explores how tweets posted to two newspaper's accounts — The Kansas City Star and the Columbia Missourian — resonated with their audience.

Using a content analysis, the researcher sought to understand how the subject and frame of tweets affected stories' online readership and the number of times a tweet was reposted. This study used conceptual episodic and thematic frames as a way to explore whether news outlets' tweets were retweeted and how many people on Twitter clicked on links to the stories. This study found that tweets posted were disproportionately episodic, but that frame did not have a statistically significant effect on online readership or retweets. The topic of a tweet significantly affected how many times it was retweeted, and for one of the newspapers in the sample, significantly affected how many page views a story received from Twitter.

CHAPTER 1: INTRODUCTION

Social media platforms including Facebook and Twitter have become an integral part of how people communicate with one another. In addition to sharing personal information with friends and family, social media users often use the platforms as tools for managing what news and information they find important. Users share content with their social networks and save news stories so they can revisit them later (Lee & Ma, 2012). Some news organizations have stood out as more willing and capable than others at developing effective social media presences. They have done this by creating news applications and producing content well suited for an online audience. For example, the investigative online news website ProPublica created a music video explaining the ethical implications of Super PACS in 2012 (Bean & Holmes, 2012). This non-traditional story telling demonstrated a willingness to use multimedia to present content in an inventive manner. However, even with innovations like this, much still remains unknown about how to best engage news consumers in online settings, particularly on social media platforms. What content will resonate with users and motivate them to read and share it?

Thanks to tools such as Google Analytics and applications newsrooms use to schedule social media posts, journalists have the ability to learn what content news consumers view online, how long they spend with it, and whether they found it on social media platforms (Plaza, 2011). Marketers have used information from Google Analytics to determine what types of online content motivate people to stay on a website longer, view other pages on the website, and return to the site later (Plaza, 2011). Some research has examined how brands can best drive social media engagement, but less research examines what types of social media posts from news outlets drive the strongest engagement on these same platforms.

Understanding what types of information people seek online is critical for newsroom decision-makers. In order to remain relevant and financially afloat, news organizations must effectively promote their content and produce content people want to read and share. It is no longer enough to publish content and expect people to take interest in it on their own (Garber, 2011). Since 2008, the number of people who use social media has almost doubled, and Twitter has experienced the most recent growth in new members (Hampton, Goulet, Rainie & Purcell, 2011). Beyond considerations of the financial bottom line, an appreciation for how and why people engage with certain types of content helps journalists better serve their audiences by informing decisions about what to publish and how to promote it.

This study applied framing theory to the question of social media engagement. In the past, episodic and thematic framing have been applied to broadcast news stories to determine how news outlets portrayed political news and how episodic and thematic frames affected viewers' takeaway from the content (Iyengar, 1991). However past research did not apply framing theory to social media posts. In this study, story frame was coupled with story topic to determine how the two affected stories' performance on social media.

CHAPTER 2: LITERATURE REVIEW

Current social media tactics employed by newsrooms

Research has shown that Twitter use by newsrooms has been associated with both increases in online traffic and a change in how news consumers understand content. When newspapers in one study first begin using Twitter to promote their brand, they saw an increase of 1 percent month-on-month in website traffic (Hong, 2012). This research did not account for the quality or type of content newspapers posted on Twitter nor control for the simultaneous adoption of other social media platforms such as Facebook and Reddit. This being said, the study illustrates that newsrooms' adoption of Twitter correlates with an immediate jump in web traffic.

Twitter is not only associated with increases in online news readership, but also with a change in the way people understand the news. Social media in general, but Twitter in particular, have caused journalism to take on an "ambient" quality (Hermida, 2010). Instead of understanding news after all is said and done, news consumers have learned to follow the news as it is being reported. Twitter acts as an awareness system through which people can disseminate and collect information as it becomes relevant to them (Hermida, 2010).

In a study of five British newspapers, researchers found that newsroom practices lag behind research explaining best practices for social media, and there is much room for improvement in online social strategies (Kerrigan & Graham, 2010). A focus group indicated that newsrooms are often reluctant to open up the processes of reporting and editing to their audience using social media and instead limit participation to debates about current events (Kerrigan & Graham, 2010). The findings from Kerrigan & Graham's study demonstrate the practical applications of understanding what types of news stories resonate with social media users. Kerrigan & Graham's findings also suggest that newsrooms publishing content that invites response and participation would likely generate high levels of social engagement. Employing these strategies could create a media landscape in which the audience plays a more active role in shaping and adding to news content after publication.

Topic salience and social media posts

Professional news outlets play a key role in agenda setting for online discussions. Intense media coverage of a topic makes the subject appear important to news consumers. This high level of news coverage also generates enough interest and initiative for news consumers to post about the topic online. The power of news organizations to influence discussions online varies by subject (Roberts, Wanta & Dzwo, 2002). Roberts, Wanta & Dzwo's research concluded that the topics news organizations cover affect social media engagement. Further research could extend beyond stories newsrooms publish, and look at social media posts written by that publication. Studying whether the same conclusions concerning the salience of topics on Internet bulletin boards applied to Twitter, where people often use their full names and interact with people they know in person, is a natural extension of this research.

Even so, the types of news often paid attention to by media outlets are not necessarily the same as the news that gets the most attention on Twitter. In a study of what social media editors at popular television networks and newspapers posted to their personal accounts, research found the selection of news the editors tweeted differed from the brands they worked for (Wasike, 2013). Although there were differences between what content social media editors for television networks and newspapers posted, both posted science and technology stories more frequently than other types of news. Science and technology stories outscored stories about war and terrorism by 14 percent. The news frames posted to Twitter by social media editors differed significantly from news frames the mainstream media normally emphasizes, even on news outlets' branded Twitter accounts.

This demonstrates the relevance of looking at what news frames people engage with on social media.

In a study examining the use of a social bookmarking website called Delicious, researchers found that newspapers and television websites combined comprise a higher percentage of news content shared, but users often turn to new media sources like blogs and independent online publications when sharing news (Chung & Yi, 2009). Traditional outlets were popular for sharing news about the economy, environmental issues and general news headlines. Delicious users most frequently turned to blogs and independent online publications to share news about technology, a topic that newspapers and broadcast news stations do not cover with high frequency. News stories about politics and military action, which have historically been treated with great importance by news outlets, do not drive sharing activity by Delicious users (Chung & Yi, 2009). What news consumers share online can vary significantly from what traditional news outlets have historically deemed important. It also suggests possible categorizations for news stories when researching what news users are likely to find on Twitter.

Another study demonstrating the importance of content type in the popularity of content on social media looked at Reddit and Digg, websites designed to let users post news they find interesting and vote stories the users find interesting to the website's homepage. Articles about science and technology were the most popular, followed by entertainment stories. Human-interest stories garnered the most comments from users of both websites (Wasike, 2011).

While these studies address the topics of content specific groups of social media users are likely to share with social media, they do not explore what effect, if any, framing has and whether it affects social media sharing or online page views.

The psychology of sharing on social media

Research has assessed the motives people feel when they seek out news content online. In particular, one study looked at the psychology behind why people watch videos on YouTube and why they choose to share them with their social networks. The study found that people who watch traditional news videos do so because they want information. People who then share these videos tend to do so in order to express themselves and contribute their own ideas (Hanson & Haridakis, 2008).

For journalists to effectively use social media, it is critical to have a target audience in mind and understand who is likely to turn to social media for information gathering and sharing. Whether a person seeks news using social networking websites is a significant predictor of social capital as well as civic engagement and political participation. A person's use of social media websites with the specific purpose of finding news significantly increases social capital, which is linked to a stronger sense of belonging in and responsibility to a community (Zúñiga, 2012).

Similarly, social media users are more likely to share news and opinions if they are driven to use social media for the purpose of seeking information, socializing, and seeking attention from their personal networks. The anticipation of social interaction might be a significant motivating factor that influences whether people share news on social media websites. People also share news using social media websites as a way to archive news so they can retrieve it later. Entertainment, however, does not play a significant role in motivating people to share news on social media websites. This could result from other entertainment features on social media websites such as games and instant messaging features (Lee & Ma, 2012).

The importance of time in predicting engagement

In addition to personal relationships, civic engagement, and news source, factors as simple as time of day can play a role in whether people engage with content on social media. Doerr, Blenn, Tang & Van argued that the timing of Digg posts played a bigger role in popularity than did the friend feature. Their research challenged an idea cited earlier in this review suggesting that personal connections between people who use the social networking website Digg are crucial in predicting whether a story posted to the site goes “viral.” The study found that Digg users who aren’t linked to one another in an official capacity as friends on the website might still be connected to each other through shared interests and voting patterns on the website. These relationships between users, coupled with the timing of when links were posted, to Digg played a bigger role in determining which stories were popular on Digg than friendship between users (Doerr, Blenn, Tang & Van, 2012). Although such links between users are important, the timing of posts and post subjects play a more critical role in engaging an online audience.

Research exploring Digg and YouTube found future popularity of content on those websites could be predicted by observing the number of votes received on Digg or views received on YouTube within the first two hours of posting. Although Doerr, Blenn, Tang & Van’s study did not investigate what types of content have high likelihoods of becoming popular, it did explore how initial popularity impacts future popularity. These findings could also suggest that initial engagement might be a possible variable in a study of engagement with news content on Facebook and Twitter.

Social media use is playing a growing role in aggregation of news content, gatekeeping, and how people share and discuss the news with one another. For news organizations to move forward, journalists must understand how to effectively use social media platforms to generate discussion, sharing, and page views on their outlet's website. Research has shown that specific topics have varying levels of resonance with social media users, depending on the website. Furthermore, personal relationships, phrasing, and content of social media posts also predict engagement with that content. For news outlets to effectively use social media platforms such as Twitter, they must understand how to harness those variables into tweets that will engage readers. This means understanding how types of stories motivate people to share them online, and what types of stories generate page views, online comments, and engagement with news outlets.

Theoretical framework

When studying political stories on television news, Shanto Iyengar examined episodic and thematic news framing in political news stories. Iyengar defined episodic news as "illustrations of issues," such as a specific event versus thematic news, which portrays stories "more broadly and abstractly by placing them in some appropriate context"

(Iyengar, 1991). Iyengar's research found that with some variance by topic, thematic frames tended to cause viewers to hold their elected officials and broader societal factors accountable for the issues at hand more frequently than did episodic frames.

In research expanding on this framing of news stories, one study found that episodic news stories generated stronger emotional responses, but subjects were more persuaded by thematic stories (Gross 2008). Another study presented participants with pieces of opinion-based writing expressing viewpoints either supporting or condemning a controversial Danish law regarding immigration status and marriage. Participants were divided into groups assigned to read an episodically-framed piece in favor of the law, a thematically-framed piece against the law, an episodically-framed piece against the law, or a thematically-framed piece against the law (Aarøe, 2011).

Since "episodic frames provide the receiver with a specific focal point of reaction" Aarøe expected them to have more influence the participants' opinions. The study found episodic frames triggered much stronger emotional responses. The results also suggest that thematic frames can even lower people's emotional response to a subject.

Given the different emotional effects of these two frames, a logical extension of this research is to examine whether they generate different responses from a social media audience. Specifically, it is appropriate to investigate whether tweets with episodic or thematic frames motivate more people to share news and which frame compels more people to click the links posted on Twitter.

Investigating how people engage with episodic and thematic news online seems like a natural progression of research that has already been done. Based on previous research, the following questions were investigated:

RQ 1: How do frame and category subject affect how often a tweet is retweeted?

RQ2: Do frame and category subject have a significant effect on how many clicks links posted to Twitter receive?

RQ3: What frames and categories are most commonly found in tweets

CHAPTER 3: METHODS

Summary

This research focused on how framing and story topic affect what online news content people find and share on the social media platform Twitter. In order to do this, the study looked at how many times tweets from each newspaper were retweeted. Doing this offered insight into what patterns emerged based on the content of the tweets. Similarly, this research used the number of page views links posted to Twitter received to explore how the content of a tweet affects news stories' online readership.

Because certain types of news stories naturally lend themselves to either an episodic or thematic frame, this study first took into account the topic a story covered. For example, crime stories were evaluated separately from business stories. Once stories in the sample were categorized by topic, coders determined whether the stories had an episodic or thematic frame. Then the Web analytics for these stories were used to examine how many times people clicked on links in the tweets and how many people shared the stories by retweeting the original tweets.

This study used information gathered from The Kansas City Star, a daily newspaper published in the Kansas City metropolitan area. The newspaper has a 553,200 daily print circulation (770,300 Sunday circulation) and has about 3.8 million unique visitors to its website each month (The Kansas City Star staff). McClatchy Co. owns The Kansas City Star. This newspaper was chosen for convenience reasons and because the researcher was initially granted permission to use information about page views from The Kansas City Star's online analytics service.

Due to a change in McClatchy Co. policy, not all of the analytics information that was originally promised was available at the time of the study. Instead, the company provided analytics information for 10 percent of the sample from The Kansas City Star. This portion of the sample was used to study the effects of category and frame on page views. The entire sample from the Star was used to study the effects of category and framing on retweets.

The Columbia Missourian is one of two daily newspapers in Columbia, Mo. The Columbia Missourian is a 501(c)(3) nonprofit incorporated as the Missouri Publishing Association (Koehn, 2013). This newspaper was used in the study for convenience purposes, and because the researcher had access to archived social media posts and Web analytics information.

Sample

The Kansas City Star published 2,429 tweets during the sample time. The Columbia Missourian published 346. A random sample from each of these data sets was pulled using a random number generator from the website random.org. This study used 580 tweets were pulled from The Kansas City Star's account and 82 from the Columbia Missourian's. Those numbers are approximately equal to the average number of tweets each publication posted a week. Tweets that did not include links back to the newspapers' websites were excluded from the sample.

Because the sample was pulled randomly, results are generalizable to content published to The Kansas City Star's Twitter account between Jan. 27 and Feb. 27, 2014 and the Columbia Missourian's Twitter account during February 2014 (Wimmer and Dominick 2011). This timeframe was selected both for convenience reasons and to avoid covering a time period with major religious holidays or spikes in holiday travel.

Because The Kansas City Star does not use computer programs to schedule social media posts, Tweets published to The Kansas City Star were collected using ScraperWiki. ScraperWiki is an online service that allows users to find Twitter posts that meet certain criteria and puts them into a downloadable spreadsheet. The spreadsheets include, among other things, each tweet's text, retweet count and URLs included in the tweet (Zappa, 2014). ScaperWiki was used to gather tweets published between Jan. 27, 2014 and Feb. 27, 2014. This time period was chosen for convenience and to allow for some variation in days of the week, and to allow for enough time that any single event would be unlikely to distort news coverage for an entire month.

Tweets from the Columbia Missourian were collected from SocialFlow, a scheduling tool used by the newspaper to publish posts to Twitter and Facebook. Social Flow records the number of retweets each tweet receives as well as how many times people click on links included in the tweet. Tweets published during February were pulled to create a sample for this study.

Coding tweets

Coders recorded their decisions for theme and category subject on a spreadsheet that had information about tweets posted from The Kansas City Star and Columbia Missourian's Twitter accounts. Stories were distinguished by category subject to help account for differences in page views and retweets that could be caused by subject matter rather than story frame. Category subjects were based on traditional newspaper beats (city/county government, state government, business, crime, health, education and sports). The subject category “neighborhood news” was used to categorize local news that didn’t obviously fall under an established beat. Stories that didn’t fall under any of the established subject categories were classified as “other.” It was also done in the hope of making the research’s results more easily applicable for practicing journalists seeking to better understand the types of news content likely to gain traction on social media.

Tweet subject category

Coders began by identifying which subject category was the grammatical subject of the tweet. Tweets are limited to 140 characters, and as a result, most tweets consist of a single sentence or clause. To determine the category of a tweet, coders identified the subject and object of the sentence or clause. The subject of a sentence or a clause is defined as the person or things carrying out the action. The object is defined as “the direct receiver of the action in a sentence” (Brooks, Pinson, & Wilson, 2010).

In many tweets, the subject and the object fit in the same subject category of story. In those cases, the tweet was coded as having the subject category of both the subject and object. In cases where the subject and the object fell into different subject categories, it was often the case that either the subject or object would be generic (such as “Kansas City man,” and only one of them would fit into a category on the code sheet. Many tweets had generic subjects or subject such as "Kansas City woman" followed by an object that fits into a category "trespassing charges." In those instances, coders were instructed to categorize the tweet based on the subject or object that fits into one of the categories. Coders chose among the following categories when analyzing tweets:

- 1. City/county government: This category was used if the subject or object of the tweet was city or county regulation, government organization or department, election or people who work for city or county campaigns. One tweet in the city/county government subject category was "From @dhellingkc - How @MayorSlyJames weathered the big snowstorm."
- 2. State government: This category was used if the subject or object of the tweet was a statewide regulation, government organization or department, election, or people who work for state campaign. The tweet "Proposed Kansas response on gay marriage debated" was categorized as state government, for example.
- 3. Business: This category was used if the subject or object of the tweet was an event or trend at a specific company, group of companies, type of business, owner or employee of a business. This included all types of businesses including casinos, restaurants, tax firms and movie theaters. "Kansas agency launches $380K problem gambling effort" was one tweet that was coded as being in the business subject category.

4. Crime: This category was used when the subject or object of the tweet was crime and criminal law enforcement. This applied to tweets about specific crimes, trends in crime, court cases, and police activity. Tweets about crime policy were categorized as either state or city/county government, depending on who would enforce the law. An example of a crime tweet can be seen in this tweet from The Kansas City Star: "Feds seek to shield evidence in Kansas suicide bomb case."

5. Health: This category was used if subject or object of the tweet was health or health-related issues. If the subject was a law relating to health, the tweet was categorized according as a state or local government story, depending on which level of government was discussing or enacting it. The tweet "Report: Childhood cancer cases up, but deaths down" was coded as being in the health subject category, for example.

6. Education: If the subject or object of the tweet is a school, a school district, a university, a university system, teachers or professors the tweet was categorized as education. Tweets about state education policy were categorized as state government.

The tweet “ICYMI - The flip side of learning: New method lets teachers give students more attention” was coded as an education tweet.

7. Sports: If the subject or object of the tweet is a sports team, a sports league, or a specific sporting event, it was categorized as sports. This included school sports, professional sports and college sports. The post “Would the #Chiefs draft Michael Sam? In later rounds, perhaps” was classified as a sports tweet.

8. Neighborhood news: If the subject or object of a tweet includes a specific neighborhood or part of town, but didn’t seem to fit into any of the categories listed above, it was categorized as neighborhood. This could include stories about road construction, human-interest stories and other lifestyle news. “Kansas City's #snowday fun” was coded as being in the neighborhood news subject category.

9. Other: If the tweet had more than one sentence or clause with multiple subjects, it fell into the “other” category. This occurred if the tweets subjects fall into different categories. This also applied if the subject of a tweet does not fit into any of the above categories. Tweets that had a national focus often fell into this category. For example, the tweet “Obama touts wage hike, creates 'myRA' savings plan” was categorized as other.

Tweet frame

Episodic and thematic framing has been well-documented and tested since Iyengar's research. That these definitions have been employed in studies for more than two decades gives the coding in this study greater reliability. This study used content analysis to allow the results to be stated more precisely and succinctly than other methods might (Wimmer & Dominick, 2011). This study used a random sample from a month's worth of tweets to help account for significant breaking or local news that might present confounding variables in the study. Because "for news content, daily and monthly variations in key variables are important to tap ... These cyclic variations are important to consider for all cases of sampling" (Neuendor, 2002).

Once the coders determined what the primary topics of the tweets were, they coded the stories for frame. Tweets were categorized as having either a thematic or episodic news frame, using definitions outlined by Shanto Iyengar's work examining political news (Iyengar, 1991). Tweets focusing on singular events and specific people, depicting the content "in terms of concrete instances (for example, the plight of a homeless person or a teenage drug user" were coded as episodic content, according to Iyengar's definition (Iyengar, 1991). Conversely, tweets with a more "general or abstract context" and that focused on broader topics such as "changes in government welfare expenditures ... the social or political grievances of groups undertaking terrorist activity” were coded as having a thematic frame (Iyengar, 1991).

Once the tweets were coded, data about page views from tweets posted to the Columbia Missourian’s accounts and retweets of tweets posted to the Columbia Missourian and The Kansas City Star’s accounts were used to examine the effect those frames had on how the audience chose to use the content. Due to a change in corporate policy at McClatchy Company, information on page views for the stories published to The Kansas City Star’s Twitter account became unavailable during the course of this study. The researcher was originally granted permission to use information from the Web Analytics in November 2013. The permission was revoked in March 2014, but the Star did provide analytics information for 10 percent of the sample. The publicly available information containing tweet text and retweet count were used.

To see the instructions coders used when making their decisions, please see Appendix A on page 37. The codebook can be found in Appendix B on page 42.

Intercoder reliability

One other coder was used to measure intercoder reliability and test for validity. Cohen's kappa was calculated to measure agreement between two coders. The coders both coded 62 tweets from the sample. For category, kappa = .874. For tweet frame, kappa = .842. A minimum reliability coefficient of approximately .75 is generally accepted for published work when using pi or kappa to calculate reliability (Wimmer & Dominick, 2011).

A total of 662 tweets were coded for this study. For a full spreadsheet of all tweets and how they were coded, see Appendix B on page 42.

Statistical analysis

This study used a factorial ANOVA test to determine the effect of the independent variables (episodic or thematic frames) on the dependent variable (clicks). This analysis was selected because it allows for testing of two or more variables at once and can also test the relationship between two independent variables. (Cronk, 2012).

Because this study employs content analysis, intercoder reliability was assessed to determine the reliability of the initial categories (episodic and thematic) in which stories in the sample were placed. The intercoder reliability will be calculated using Cohen's kappa.

CHAPTER 4: FINDINGS

Relationship between frame, category and retweets

RQ 1: How do frame and category subject affect how often a tweet is retweeted?

A nine (category) by three (frame) between-subjects factorial ANOVA was calculated comparing the retweet counts for tweets that fell into one of nine categories and were framed one of three ways. Retweet data from the Kansas City Star and Columbia Missourian's Twitter accounts were combined and tested together. The factorial ANOVA is a powerful test because it allows researchers to test the effects of each independent variable as well as the effects of interaction between independent variables (Cronk, 2012).

The subject category of tweets had a significant effect on retweets at the .05 level ($F(8,637) = .013, p < .05$). Tweets about neighborhood news had a mean retweet count of 3.795 ($sd = .686$), the highest mean of any of the categories. Stories about crime had a mean retweet count of .92 ($sd = .608$), the lowest of any of the categories. The interaction between frame and category was not significant ($F(8,636) = .216, p > .05$).

Table 1: Mean retweet counts by tweet subject category

Dependent Variable: Retweet count

category	Mean	Std. Error	95% Confidence Interval
			Lower Bound	Upper Bound
city/county government	.769 ^a	.698	-.601	2.140
state government	1.187 ^a	.358	.484	1.891
business	1.171 ^a	.494	.201	2.140
crime	.920 ^a	.608	-.274	2.114
health	2.382 ^a	.645	1.116	3.648
education	2.204 ^a	.599	1.028	3.379

* $p = .05$

In other words, tweets' subject category had a significant effect on the number of times they were retweeted. This means it is 95 percent certain that the differences in means (that city/county government tweets had a lower average retweet count than tweets about health news, for example) were not due to chance or error.

Tweets about neighborhood news were retweeted more than tweets from any of the other subject categories. For example, The Kansas City Star's tweet "Say it ain't snow! 5 to 9 inches of snow and sleet are expected to accumulate this weekend" was retweeted 14 times. The tweet "In-A-Tub: A Northland tradition," also posted by the Star, was retweeted seven times. In Kansas City, the Northland is an area of the metro-area north of the Missouri River.

Tweets about health and education news also received a high mean number of retweets. The Kansas City Star's tweet "Kansas teen uses 3-D printer to make hand for boy" received 15 retweets. "The new MU chancellor, @bowtieger, is already interacting with students via Twitter," a tweet from the Columbia Missourian's account, was retweeted eight times.

By comparison, tweets about government, crime and sports did not perform strongly. "#Royals face fewer decisions this spring, but they are key" was not retweeted at all. Similarly, the Star's tweet "Wolf plans 3 Kansas rallies with tea party group" did not receive any retweets. An example of a low-performing episodic tweet about crime comes from The Kansas City Star's account: "Independence police release photos in armed robbery." That tweet was not retweeted at all, either.

The main effect for whether the tweets had an episodic or thematic frame was not significant. ($F(2,637) = .853, p > .05$). Thus, it appears that whether the tweet is episodically or thematically framed does not have any significant effect on the retweet count. Episodic tweets had a mean retweet count of 1.559 ($sd = .165$), and thematic tweets had a mean retweet count of 1.706 ($sd = .342$).

frame	Mean	Std. Error	95% Confidence Interval
			Lower Bound	Upper Bound
episodic	1.559	.165	1.235	1.883
thematic	1.706	.342	1.034	2.378
neither	1.500 ^a	1.326	-1.105	4.105

a. Based on modified population marginal mean.

In other words, thematic tweets had a slightly higher average number of retweets than episodic tweets, but because the results were not significant at the .05 level, this difference could be due to chance or error.

Relationship between frame, category and story clicks

RQ2: Do frame and category subject have a significant effect on how many clicks links posted to Twitter receive?

Tweets from the Kansas City Star and Columbia Missourian were analyzed separately for this research question. Because the Columbia Missourian uses SocialFlow, a social media scheduling platform, to post its tweets, the researcher was able to see how many times links from each specific tweet were clicked. Tweets from The Kansas City Star's account were not posted this way, and as a result, the researcher could only view how many times visitors had clicked on a story link in any tweet, not necessarily just from the tweets the Star posted. For this reason, the page view information from each newspaper was analyzed separately.

For the data from the Columbia Missourian, a nine (category) by three (frame) between-subjects factorial ANOVA was calculated comparing the number of clicks for tweets that had one of nine categories and were framed one of three ways. The main effect for category was not significant ($F(7,68) = .365, p > .05$).

Dependent Variable: clicks

category	Mean	Std. Error	95% Confidence Interval
			Lower Bound	Upper Bound
city/county government	23.429	9.922	3.630	43.227
state government	26.000	12.375	1.307	50.693

other	28.358	6.964	14.463	42.254

a. Based on modified population marginal mean.

In other words, the category of the Missourian’s tweets did not significantly affect whether people clicked on the stories linked to in the posts. Although sports tweets had the lowest average number of clicks and education had the highest, this difference could be due to error or chance.

The main effect for how the tweet was framed not significant. ($F(1,68) = .48, p > .05$). The interaction between the two independent variables was also not significant ($F(5,68) = .801, p > .05$).

Table 4: Missourian click information by frame

Dependent Variable: clicks

frame	Mean	Std. Error	95% Confidence Interval
			Lower Bound	Upper Bound
episodic	33.494	3.834	25.844	41.144
thematic	26.125 ^a	6.187	13.778	38.472

a. Based on modified population marginal mean.

This means that how tweets were framed did not affect the number of times people clicked on the stories they linked to. There also was not a significant effect for a tweet’s frame combined with its category. Any difference in means could be attributed to chance or error.

Data from The Kansas City Star showed different results. For the data from The Kansas City Star, a nine (category) by three (frame) between-subjects factorial ANOVA was calculated comparing the number of page views for tweets that had one of nine categories and were framed one of three ways. ($F(7,40) = .002, p < .05$).

In other words, the subject category of a tweet had a significant effect on the number of page views that story received from Twitter. Tweets about health news performed very well, with an average of 2,448 page views coming from Twitter. For example, the tweet “Kansas teen uses 3-D printer to make hand for boy” received more than 4,800 page views from Twitter. “Polio-like disease appears in California children” had 580 page views from Twitter. Although tweets about sports were not high performing when it came to retweets, they did have a high number of page views from Twitter. The tweet “KU heads to Baylor with new attitude after first Big 12 loss” had 130 page views from Twitter, for example.

On the other hand, stories about state government performed poorly by comparison, with a mean of 54 page views from Twitter. For example, “Rally on Kansas Capitol decries House 'religious freedom' bill” had only 10 page views from Twitter. “Kansas State Education Board considering changes to teacher licensing” had 47 page views from Twitter.

Frequency of different categories and frames

RQ3: What frames and categories are most commonly found in tweets?

A Chi-square goodness of fit test was calculated comparing the different tweet subject categories. For this test, tweets from the Columbia Missourian and Kansas City Star were combined and tested together. It was hypothesized that each subject category would occur an equal number of times. Significant deviation from the hypothesized value was found. Results were significant at the .001 level.

$$\chi^2 (7) = 23.561, p < 0.001$$

Category of 580 tweets posted by The Kansas City Star between Jan. 27 and Feb. 27, 2014 and 82 tweets posted to by the Columbia Missourian during February, 2014.*

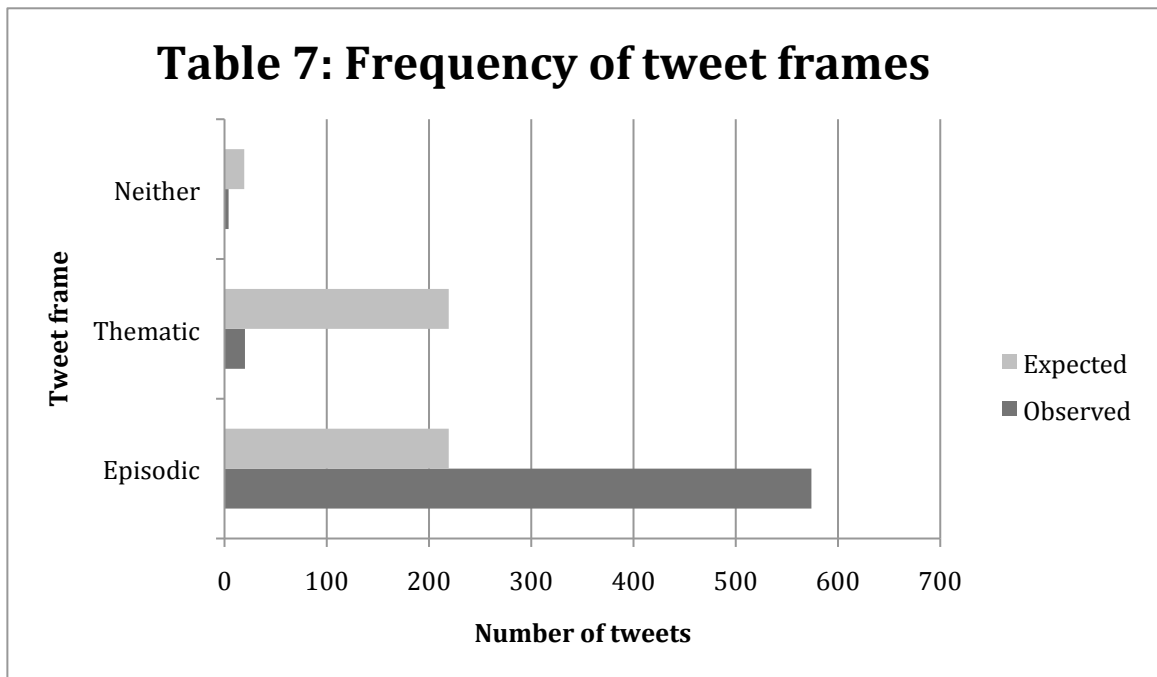

This means that certain categories of stories were posted to Twitter significantly more than others. Sports stories were posted the most frequently, followed by stories in the "other" category and crime stories. The Chi-square goodness of fit test showed that it is 95 percent certain that differences between the number of each times the subject categories were posted is not due to chance or error.

A Chi-square goodness of fit test was also calculated comparing the different tweet frames. It was hypothesized that episodic tweets would occur the same number of times as thematic tweets. Significant deviation from the hypothesized value was found. This means that episodic tweets were posted significantly more than thematic tweets.

$$X^2 (1) = 23.610, p < 0.05$$

In other words, it is 95 percent certain that this difference was not due to chance or error. The content posted to the newspapers' Twitter accounts was not compared to the content published on their website. The ratios of subject categories and frames posted could be a result of selecting which stories to post, a product of what categories and frames are published the most often, or some combination of the two.

CHAPTER 5: DISCUSSION

Lessons about selecting stories to tweet

Perhaps one of the most telling takeaways from this research is the seeming disconnect between the category of stories the two newsrooms chose to share on Twitter and the types of stories their audiences felt compelled to share themselves. As stated in the findings section, a Chi-square goodness of fit test found there were significant differences between the number of times each category of story was posted. Sports stories and crime stories in particular were tweeted more frequently than stories about other categories. The sample, which contained 156 sports stories and 106 crime stories, had only 61 neighborhood news stories, 17 health stories and 33 education stories.

Although it comes as little surprise that sports and crime stories were posted more frequently than stories from other subject categories, the discrepancies are compelling because the data analysis showed that story category has a significant effect on the number of retweets stories receive. Neighborhood news stories had a mean retweet count of 3.795 ($sd = .686$); health stories had a mean retweet count of 2.382 ($sd = .645$); education stories had a mean retweet count of 2.204 ($sd = .552$). These numbers seem to indicate that proximity plays a more important role in sharing news than the celebrity culture of sports news. Newsrooms seeking to increase how often their social media posts are re-shared, should consider increasing the number of stories they post about neighborhood news, health and education, even if it means decreasing the number of sports and crime stories they tweet. For the staff members who write the social media posts or story headlines — which are often used as the text for social media posts — attention should be paid to any local connections that could be included. For example, a post about a trend in local crime should also include the specific areas of the city or state seeing the trend.

Beyond using this information to select which stories to post on social media platforms, newsroom staff members could also use it when determining where to expend reporting resources. Just as there is a finite amount of staff time and energy to spend on writing tweets, newsrooms don't have the resources to report every story. Since the data show health, education and neighborhood news generate a higher mean retweet count, newsrooms wishing to motivate their followers to share their news on social media might also consider using more of their reporting resources covering those topics.

For this information to be more valuable to newsrooms, future studies might consider conducting survey research examining why people feel motivated to share this kind of news with their social networks and why it does not always line up with what types of news people want to read themselves. This might provide a more nuanced understanding of what types of stories people want to post to their social media profiles, and how newsrooms could best tap into this potential through story selection, reporting and phrasing of social media posts.

Also worth noting was that whether a tweet had an episodic or thematic frame did not significantly affect the mean retweet count. Tweets with episodic frames were posted much more frequently than those with thematic frames, which could be a product of the limited character space allowed on Twitter, the nature of daily news posts, or some combination of the two.

Only 80 of the tweets in this study's sample had thematic frames, and 574 had episodic frames. The Chi-square goodness of fit test showed that this was a significant difference. Unlike episodic content, thematic news does not focus primarily on specific events and individual people (Iyengar, 1991). Instead, thematic news content focuses on broader trends, public policy debates and ongoing issues, and offers readers more context than episodic tweets. Given this and the fact that they don't generate significantly fewer retweets than episodic tweets, newsrooms might also include more thematic stories in their social media posts.

Suggestions for phrasing social media posts

As mentioned in the previous section, news stories about health, schools and neighborhoods receive significantly more retweets than other types of news stories. This could be because this is the type of news people feel they — and perhaps people in their social networks — can benefit personally from knowing. Stories about news such as road closures, a coming storm or a common health problem might seem more immediately relevant than a story about a policy debate in the state legislature.

This is not to say that newsrooms should avoid reporting and tweeting stories about legislation or business. However, it could mean that if news organizations took care to play up local connections, or specific, local consequences of news stories, online audience members might be more inclined to share the stories. In other words, if there is a way to phrase a tweet about public works funding in a way that ties it to a specific neighborhood or part of the city, it would be worth the extra effort.

What to take away from data about clicks and page views

Although this research didn't find a statistically significant relationship between story category, frame and clicks to news stories published in the Columbia Missourian, tweets posted by The Kansas City Star did have significant results. This information could be used to explore how newsrooms select content to share on social media. As stated earlier in this study, the data suggest that newsrooms should tweet more news about health, education and episodic neighborhood news if their goal is to get as many of their followers as possible to repost their tweets.

But deciding what stories to tweet also depends on what the newsroom wants to accomplish with each social media post. Understanding the differences that exist between what people are likely to share and what they are likely to read presents newsrooms with a challenging balancing act.

This study found that at least in the case of The Kansas City Star, the types of tweets that were most likely to be retweeted did not necessarily match up with the types of tweets that received a high number of page views from Twitter. Sports stories, which did not perform as well when it came to retweets, had the second-highest mean page view count at 322. Crime stories, which also did not do as well when it came to retweets, had an average of 171 page views from Twitter.

Similarly, though people were more likely to share neighborhood news than tweets from other subject categories, stories from that category had an average of only 43.5 page views from Twitter. This is surprising since it seems logical to infer that a high number of retweets would lead to a high number of page views, but the data suggest otherwise. If the goal of a particular tweet is to get the post (and therefore the news organization outlet's Twitter account) seen by the most people, it might make sense to post "Oklahoma Joe's is No. 3 on Yelp's list of 'Top 100 Places to Eat'" than "KU coach rules Joel Embiid out of Saturday's game vs. TCU." But if the goal is to motivate the most people to click on a link and read the news organization's content, the opposite could be true. People writing social media posts for newsrooms should be aware of what goal they are trying to achieve and contentious of the fact that the same types of posts will not always work for achieving those different goals.

It's also worth noting that the Columbia Missourian's analytics information did not show a significant relationship between how many tweet subject category and page views. Future researchers might consider examining the differences in what audiences of smaller papers feel compelled to share and read compared to the audiences of larger metro newspapers.

Limitations and suggestions for future research

The findings of this study were limited by the fact that Web analytics information was only available 10 percent of the sample coded for The Kansas City Star. More research would need to be done before the findings in this study could be broadly generalizable.

Researchers exploring the relationship between framing and online engagement should consider finding a wider range of newsrooms to use, though many newsrooms consider it proprietary and therefore will not always agree to allow it to be published.

Another limitation in the findings of this study comes from the time period during which the tweets were collected. The Sochi 2014 Winter Olympics took place during a portion of the sample period. This means there was a high-interest sporting event represented in the sample, but it had few local ties. The one exception to this was tweets about a woman from Missouri competing in the games as a speed skater. So while these results seem applicable to times of year with similar news, a study that pulled its sample when postseason baseball or college football were prominent in the news might show different results. It could be useful for newsrooms to study how or if high-interest breaking news affects what stories read and share on social media.

This study also only looked at framing and category for individual tweets, not entire news stories. Although this made it easier to show a direct relationship between the text of the tweets and their retweets and clicks, it limits what can be extrapolated from the data.

For example, if tweet category and frame do not always match the category and frame of the news stories they link to, it could be hard for newsrooms to use this data to guide their coverage decisions.

Iyengar's (1991) work still holds relevancy to journalism and can be applied to online engagement with news. However, future researchers might consider delving deeper into the nuances of episodic frames. Since the overwhelming majority of tweets in this study were episodic, it is worth studying more in-depth the effects of certain types of episodic content on news sharing and viewing. For example, a linguistic analysis of how social media posts are phrased would offer practical uses for newsroom staff members tasked with writing them.

Final thoughts

Although the social media landscape has changed dramatically since it first became part of the news dialogue, it has consistently served as a way for people to find and share news they find interesting. Journalists are not doing their audiences or themselves any favors by ignoring what stories people engage with on social media. The results in this study are just a steppingstone for future research, and hopefully can offer those working in newsrooms some practical tips for writing social media posts that can successfully motivate people to share news content and to read it themselves.

There is still a lot of ground to cover on this rapidly changing topic, but it is important for those in the news industry to strive for a better understanding of their audience so they can best reach and serve it.

Appendix A. Coder instructions

You will be reading tweets posted to The Kansas City Star and Columbia Missourian's twitter accounts. When you read these tweets, you will be assessing what the tweets focus on, and how they are framed. Use the following instructions to make your evaluations.

1. Begin by opening the Google spreadsheet called "code sheet" in your Internet browser.
2. Read the tweets, which are in the column labeled "text."
3. Identify the subject and object of the tweet. The subject is the person or thing carrying out the action in the sentence or phrase. The object is the direct receiver of the action.
4. If the subject or object of the tweet is something hard to classify like "Kansas City man," base your category selection on the more specific of the two such as "trespassing charges."
5. After you have determined the category of each tweet, you will be evaluating its frame. First determine the tweet's category, then follow the instructions for frame type to identify its frame. Do this for each tweet.

Tweet Category

1. Use the following instructions to determine the category of each tweet.

- a. City/county government (1): If the subject or object of the tweet is city or county regulation, government organization or department, election or people who work for city or county campaigns, categorize the story as city/county government by marking it with a 1 in the spreadsheet column labeled "category."
- b. State government (2): If the subject or object of the tweet is a statewide regulation, government organization or department, election, or people who work for state campaigns, categorize the story as state government by marking it with a 2 in the spreadsheet column labeled "category."
- c. Business (3): If the subject or object of the tweet is an event or trend at a specific company, group of companies, type of business, owner or employee of a business, categorize the story as business and record a 3 in the spreadsheet column labeled "category." This applies to all types of businesses including casinos, restaurants, tax firms, and movie theaters.
- d. Crime (4): If the subject or object of the tweet is crime, categorize it with a 4 in the spreadsheet column labeled "category." This applies to tweets about specific crimes, trends in crime, court cases, and police activity. A tweet about the number of murders would be included, as would tweets about a missing person or a theft. Tweets about crime policy should be categorized as either state or city/county government, depending on who would enforce the law.

- e. Health (5): If subject or object of the tweet is health or health-related issues, categorize it with a 5 in the spreadsheet column labeled "category." Tweets about health would include news about specific diseases, cold season, healthy eating tips and exercise. If the subject is a law relating to health, categorize it according as a state or local government story, depending on which level of government is discussing or enacting it.
- f. Education (6): If the subject or object of the tweet is a school, a school district, a university, a university system, teachers or professors should be categorized as education (6 in the spreadsheet column labeled "category"). Tweets about state education policy should be categorized as state government.
- g. Sports (7): If the subject or object of the tweet is a sports team, a sports league, or a specific sporting event, categorize it with a 7 in the spreadsheet column labeled "category." This includes school sports, professional sports and college sports.

- h. Neighborhood news (8): If the subject or object of a tweet is a specific neighborhood or part of town, but doesn't seem to fit into any of the categories listed above, categorize it as neighborhood news by using an 8 in the spreadsheet column labeled "category." This could include stories about road construction, human-interest stories and other lifestyle news.
- i. Other (9): If the tweet has more than one sentence or clause with more than one subject, it might fall into the "other" category. This would occur if the tweets subjects fall into different categories. Tweets like this should be categorized it as "other" with a 9 in the spreadsheet column labeled "category." This is also true if the subject of a tweet does not fit into any of the above categories.

Tweet Frame

- 2. After determining in what category the tweet belongs, code it to determine if it has an episodic (1) or thematic (2) frame. Record the tweet frame in the spreadsheet column labeled "frame." If the tweet does not fit into either of these categories, mark it as neither (3) on the spreadsheet.

3. Episodic (1): If the subject of the tweet is a specific person or a singular event, code it as episodic by recording a 1 on the spreadsheet. For example, a story about a single homicide, would be coded as episodic. A tweet linking to a story about the total number of homicides in a year would be considered thematic.
4. Thematic (2): If the subject of the tweet is a general or abstract concept, broader topic or issue, code is as thematic by typing a 2 in the spreadsheet column marked "frame." This means tweets focusing on historical trends and collective public policy debates should be categorized as thematic. For instance, a tweet linking to a story about a community problem or business trend would be categorized as thematic.
