Bees

Worker bees are always female, and divide up the hive duties, such as foraging for nectar and pollen, feeding baby bees, cleaning and guarding the hive.

A worker bee will sting as an act of defense when she senses that she or the hive is in danger. Her barbed stinger stays inside the victim, pulling out her guts when she leaves, killing her.

Drones are always male. All they do is mate with a queen, then they die. Those are the lucky ones; some don't even get a chance to mate.

Each hive has one fertile female, the queen bee. They mate with drones in the air, and lay eggs inside cells in the hive. Queens create a pheromone, queen substance, that stifles the growth of worker bees’ ovaries so they can never have offspring.
