COOKING UP A SPORTS FEATURE STORY
Dissecting the writer-editor decisions and operations that lead to sports features making it to publication

Mark Selig

Jacqui Banaszynski, Committee Chair

Abstract

As story structures and distribution models in journalism change, storytelling remains a valuable asset to writers and editors, especially in sports departments.

But before you can tell a story, you need a topic. I aimed to answer two questions: How do sportswriters and editors find story topics to potentially cover? And then how do they select which ideas they’ll move forward with?

The theoretical framework I used is the Gatekeeping theory, which focuses on the points of decision-making in the production of news. I used semi-structured interviews to reveal more about the thought processes of writers and editors at three medium-to-large newspapers and three big sports websites.

While writers and editors receive increasing information on their audience’s reading habits, they still — for the most part — rely on experience or their feel for what will work. Analytics haven’t provided a formula for the dozen journalists I polled.