ABSTRACT

The purpose of this study was to add to the knowledge base an understanding of the impact of culturally-relevant pedagogy, such as hip hop, on African American student engagement. The researcher viewed the study through the lens of Critical Race Theory.

The study population consisted of one African American faculty member and two African American students at a historically black university. Data collection methods included observations, interviews and document analysis.

The study findings articulated the importance of climate, faculty and “hip hop” pedagogy to African American student engagement. The implications of this inquiry for practice in education could impact both K-12 and higher education institutions as they address the issues of engaging African American students, creating inclusive climates, and hiring African-American faculty.
