COOPERATIVES in Missouri

By Randall E. Torgerson*

A cooperative is an organization that is operated as a business, voluntarily owned and controlled by member patrons and operated for them on a cost basis. There are 513 cooperatives serving farm operators in Missouri. This bulletin contains a directory and classification of these cooperatives on the basis of their activities and location. Maps are also used to show the frequency distribution, affiliation, and location of the cooperatives.

Other forms of organized farm activity such as bargaining associations, farm clubs, and general farm interest organizations fall outside of this definition and are not included in this report.

Cooperative businesses play an important role in Missouri agriculture. This is particularly true in the farm supply business where more than 150 local cooperatives and 100 other cooperative outlets supply farmers input needs such as feeds, seeds, fertilizers, farm chemicals, and petroleum products. Missouri farmers also make extensive use of cooperative marketing facilities. Over 60 organizations serve farmers with market outlets for their livestock, dairy, and grain products. This is typified by one of the nation's few fully integrated cooperative meat packing plants located at Springfield. Many of the supply cooperatives are multi-purpose in that they also market grain and other products. However, double counting has been avoided wherever possible in this report.

In addition to the marketing and supply cooperatives, there are 300 service cooperatives in Missouri which supply farm credit, electricity, artificial insemination, milk testing, telephone, and insurance needs. The state can also boast of a pilot rural development program in which cooperatives are an integral part of efforts to help migratory workers and others to find more productive and useful lives.

Appreciation is expressed to Miss Carol Weber for her assistance in compiling this report. Appreciation is also due the State Department of Agriculture and the newly formed, but still informal, Missouri Cooperative Committee for its cooperation and encouragement while preparing this report.

*Randall E. Torgerson is an assistant professor, Department of Agricultural Economics, University of Missouri-Columbia.

In terms of business volume, Missouri cooperatives handled $490 million in commodities in 1966-67, and ranked twelfth among the leading states in volume of products and supplies handled cooperatively. This volume was about one-fourth of the business handled by California, the number one ranking state in 1966-67, but was closely aligned with cooperative business conducted in the neighboring states of Kansas and Nebraska. The 1966-67 dollar volume represented a substantial increase over the 1959-60 volume when $303 million of commodities were handled by Missouri cooperatives.¹

Farm co-operators marketed over $100 million of products in each of three commodity sectors in 1966-67: dairying, livestock, and grain. This represented a substantial gain of $30-64 million in each of these sectors over 1959-60 levels. In particular, Missouri farmers doubled the amount of grain marketed through their cooperatives in the same time period. The most noticeable decreases in products marketed cooperatively occurred in the fruit and vegetables, poultry, and wool commodity sectors. Each represents a declining industry in the state in terms of net farm income.

Increases in the amounts of supplies purchased through Missouri cooperatives were registered in each category except containers and packaging materials between 1959-60 and 1966-67. However, these increases were not as spectacular as those found in marketing. The most noticeable increases occurred in the purchases of petroleum products, fertilizers, feeds, farm machinery and equipment, and building materials.

This increased use of cooperative business organizations has come about in spite of a drop in the total number of cooperatives operating in the state, and in the number of farm operators belonging to these cooperatives. Like other businesses, cooperatives have grown through merger, consolidation, and acquisition to take advantage of economies of size and to remain competitive. According to FCS figures, the total number of marketing and supply cooperatives operating in Missouri decreased between 1959-60 and 1966-67 from 210 to 182. Similarly, farm operations have continued to grow in size as farm numbers have diminished.

An estimated 393,085 farm operators in Missouri belong to one or more cooperative businesses in 1966-67. Of the top 12 states ranked according to volume of business done cooperatively, Missouri ranks number five in the number of memberships.

2/ Many cooperatives are engaged in more than one activity. Consequently these totals are less than the number which would be obtained by summing the columns.

3/ This total includes some cooperatives which operate in Missouri but are not headquartered here. According to the FCS, there were 184 cooperatives headquartered in Missouri in 1966-67.

The Missouri Cooperative Committee

A new association of cooperatives, organized on a state-wide basis, has been operating informally since 1966. The Missouri Cooperative Committee was brought into existence through the efforts of the University of Missouri, to bring about closer communications between cooperatives operating in the state. Since that time, representatives of regional and local organizations have worked together in areas of information, manager and director education, promotion, and development of cooperative leadership. Members of the committee include: Association of Missouri PCA's, Far-Mar-Co., Farm Credit Banks, Farmland Industries, Mid-America Dairymen, Missouri Farmers Association, Midwest Wool Marketing Association, Missouri Electric Cooperative Association, and the Interstate Producers Livestock Marketing Association.
