ALUMNUS

NEWS ABOUT PEOPLE

JANUARY-FEBRUARY 1973

GARY EAGAN/6

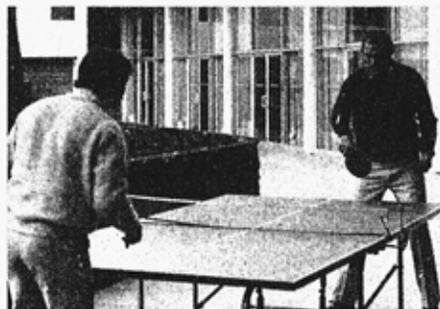

Alumnus Arch Hill, BS BA '50, and his wife, Sue, had a special interest in the Fiesta Bowl. Their son, Greg, was the Tiger star place kicker during the season, his field goals proving to be the winning margin three times. Greg's toe wasn't enough on December 23, however, as Arizona State beat the Tigers, 49 to 35, in a free-wheeling contest.

Fiesta Bowl

Three years ago at the Orange Bowl, Mark Kuhlman, right, was active as the Tiger's starting defensive tackle, not as a ping pong player. Mizzou could have used him this trip.

CLASS NOTES

Reader-interest surveys of alumni magazines prove again and again that subscribers rate the class notes of the magazine high in importance. Editors of the Missouri Alumnus are anxious to provide this service, particularly with respect to more complete coverage of the older classes. Alumni news items should be sent to Missouri Alumnus, 305 Jesse Hall, Columbia, Mo. 65201.

A POTTER IN THE VICTORIAN SPIRIT

Story and Photographs by Mike O'Brien

Gary Eagan is a Missourian turned Arkansan who currently is involved in a business boom in Little Switzerland. It isn't as geographically far-flung as it at first might seem.

Eagan, a 29-year-old potter who holds bachelor's, '65, and master's, '69, degrees in art from the University, is a leader among young businessmen who are attempting to revive the Victorian spirit of Eureka Springs. A health spa of the 1880s, the town nestles in the craggy hill country of northwest Arkansas, and was once claimed as "The Little Switzerland of the Ozarks."

A native of Springfield, Missouri, Eagan grew up in nearby Republic. Long a lover of the surrounding Ozarks hills, he nevertheless failed to discover Eureka Springs until little more than two years ago. "I knew Eureka was around here somewhere, because I'd heard vaguely about it," he recalls. "But the first time I actually saw it was when I came down in the spring of 1970 to participate in their annual Sidewalk Art Show."

What Eagan found was a quaint little community which seemed to have been forgotten by the 20th Century. Trouble was the supposedly health-giving springs fell from the favor of the country's social elite who used to frequent the numerous bathhouses and massage parlors. Much of the quaintness seemed in danger of falling to ruin through disuse.

But Eagan also found several other artists and businessmen who were interested in preserving and promoting the uniqueness of Eureka Springs. So, he decided to stay, and sought a spot to set up shop. He settled upon a sagging two-story stone structure on Spring Street in the heart of the tightly winding, steeply inclined downtown district. "We really didn't have much choice, there was little else available in the center of town," he recalls of his search for a site for his studio and gallery with his business partner, Woody Kane. "The building was built in 1885, and it burned a couple of times in its history. The major problem we faced when we took ownership was that it was caving in in the middle."

Eagan staked out the lower level of the structure for his Spring Street Pottery Shop. Floors were rebraced and adjustable steel columns were inserted to shore up buckling beams. The dirt and cobwebs of years of neglect were swept away and replaced with a pottery wheel, a kiln and Victorian furniture for the display area. "We've invested many, many dollars, and equal amounts of time and effort," Eagan admits, "but I believe it is all worth preserving. I can hardly wait until 1985, when we'll celebrate the building's 100th anniversary."

By then, Eagan hopes, Eureka Springs will be firmly established as a distinguished art colony. He and his fellow local entrepreneurs hope their investments will be successful. But not too successful.

"I think the town is invaluable mainly as an American antique," Eagan explains. "We have a great fear of over-commercialization — we've seen how it has ruined other places. But, fortunately, Eureka Springs is listed in the National Register. It's considered a national treasure. This will keep the 'tourist traps' out — unless they want to spend the money to build a nice Victorian building in the center of town."

Eagan and others have formed the Historical District Merchants Association to help preserve the town's heritage. One of the group's next projects, he notes, is to "take out after the billboards" which have begun to spring up along the rough hillside roads in the area.

Still, despite their improvements and high hopes for the future, the efforts and ambitions of Eagan and other young investors have not been received favorably by all of Eureka Springs' 1500 residents.

Until the drive to emphasize the artistic and cultural possibilities of the community, the chief attraction of the town in recent years had been the "Christ of the Ozarks" statue, a seven-story-tall concrete creation and its attendant "Great Passion Play" and "Christ Only Art Gallery" atop nearby Magnetic Mountain.

The man behind these projects is Gerald L. K. Smith, a fiery promoter who has stirred religious and racial controversy since his days as a confidant of the late Gov. Huey (Kingfish) Long of Louisiana in the 1930s. Smith has been supported in his efforts to transform Eureka Springs into a Christian mecca (he currently is starting construction on "The New Holy Land," a sprawling scale model of spots Christ walked 2000 years ago) by the local newspaper, The Times-Echo. The newspaper has spoken out editorially against the influx of young artist-businessmen. "30 "Hippies," the newspaper has called the newcomers, "who have formed divergent philosophies, who want to take over the city's government." Most, suggests The Times-Echo, "should be given a quick ticket out." Eagan only smiles when the intra-city "feud" is mentioned. The situation is mellowing, he assures, as older residents see the long-range intent of the new investors.

"Obviously," Eagan says, looking about his studio-gallery, "with this much at stake, I intend to stay. I want to make Eureka Springs my permanent home. I'm not here to make a fast buck and disappear. I'm buying a home here. There's room for everybody."

And so Eagan continues his work through the winter, readying his shelves for the summer season. His pottery, a visitor notes, seems a curious blend of the old and the new. "I like to think I'm somewhere in between the Victorian Age and today in my work," he agrees. "Some of my work is modern, and some is reminiscent of Victorian pottery. I sometimes hope I'm doing what a Victorian potter would do if he had today's tools and techniques."

The gallery door opens to admit a customer, and Eagan washes the clay from his hands to tend to business. "Come back again," he smiles, as the customer departs after a tour of several minutes and a purchase. "We'll be here." □

ALASKAN TRADER

Dennis Corrington knelt on the floor of the hut and spread out his wares: a Coleman stove, hunting knives, a down parka, rubber insulated boots and other wares. The Eskimo looked at the items, but they talked of other things: friends they both knew, the weather and hunting. Finally the man showed Corrington some carvings he had made and the trading began. An ivory bracelet was exchanged for a hunting knife and a soapstone carving for some children's tee shirts.

Alaskan trading dates back to the whaling and fur-trading days of the 19th century. For Corrington, it started in 1970, when he and his wife Mary, a former airline stewardess, opened the Arctic Trading Post in Nome, Alaska. Trading is not simple, Corrington, who speaks the Eskimo dialect, explains. It requires a lot of time and patience, traveling to the villages, sitting with an artisan in his home, appraising the work and silently letting trust grow. An appreciative grunt now and then is acceptable, though, and does not run up the asking price.

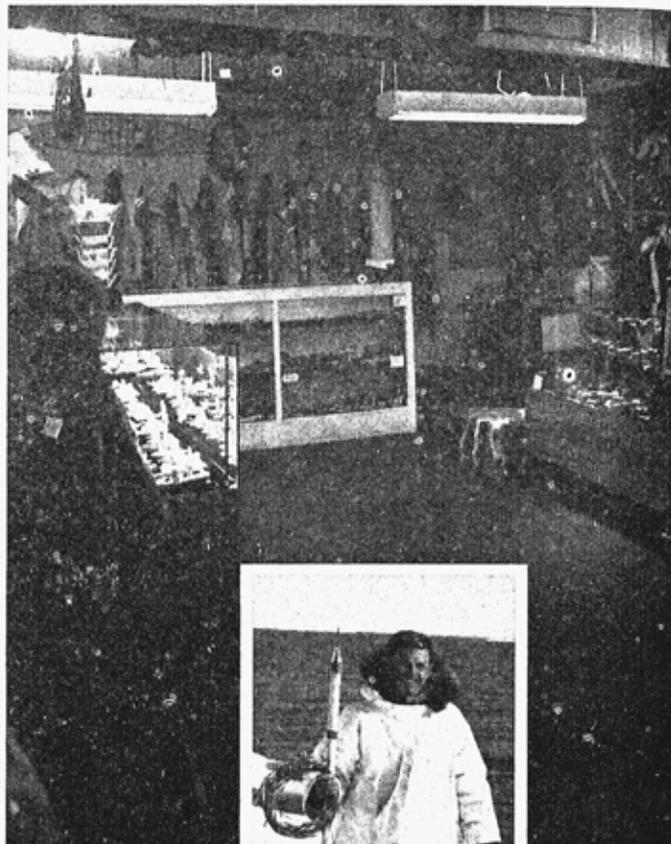

The Corringtons originally moved to Alaska to teach. He has both a bachelor's in education, '66, and a masters in education administration, '67, from the University, and she has a bachelor's in home economics, '66. "We put out applications all over the world for teaching positions and decided to either pick the place or the price," Mrs. Corrington says.

They had hoped to end up in the South Pacific or West Indies, but the pay there was mainly sun and surf. So they settled for the highest paying job offer; the William E. Beltz Regional Boarding High School in Nome.

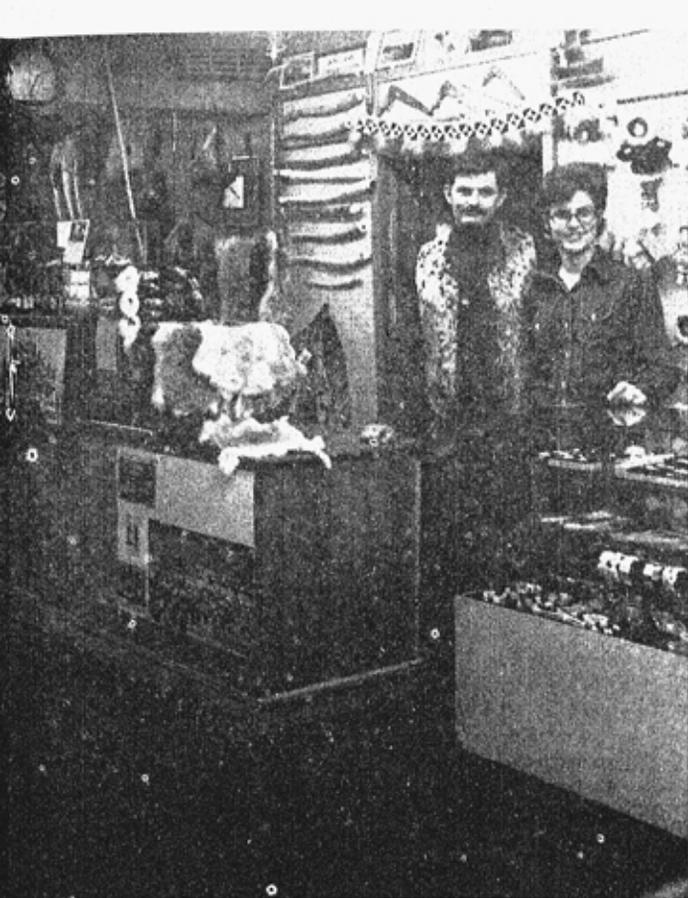

A long way from a tropical island, Nome is 150 miles below the Arctic Circle and only 200 miles from the Siberian coast of Russia. One of Corrington's trading stops is Little Diomed, an Eskimo village within sight of Siberia. "It's all right to look at, but not even the Eskimos cross over now," he says. "The Russians started taking a hard line and held some of them for several days. They didn't harm them but they did scare hell out of them."

Teaching at the boarding school turned out to be an interesting but difficult assignment. The students spoke English as a second language at school. The Eskimo dialects, Yupik or Inyupik, were spoken the rest of the time, Corrington says. There also was a cultural barrier to overcome. The students come to Nome from about 30 different Eskimo villages scattered around Northwest Alaska. They leave home conditions that are primitive (no electricity or running water; large families living in one or two rooms; and a diet of Eskimo food, seal oil, whale meat and walrus; and "white-man's" food) and enter an environment that is similar to the school system that Corrington grew up with in St. Louis County. "It's a real cultural shock to them," he says.

Corrington and his wife taught for one year at the school. Then, Mary returned to aviation, working for a local bush airline that serves the Seward Peninsula, while Dennis continued at Beltz as principal.

He became increasingly dissatisfied and critical, though, about the education that the Eskimos were receiving. "It's a mystery to me why Eskimo children need Latin to spear a Walrus. Indians and Eskimos should be educated to become leaders of Indians and Eskimos, not followers of white men," he says.

The natives caught on to Corrington quickly. The students at Beltz dedicated their 1970 yearbook "to Mr. Dennis Corrington. He has been our teacher, guide, counselor and principal. We feel that he has devoted his time and energy to our education because he has a genuine concern for the Eskimo community of North-West Alaska."

But the Alaska Department of Education did not appreciate Corrington's criticism. They tried to transfer him. He refused and resigned in 1970. The Corringtons then were faced with the decision to either take their savings and "retire" to a warm South Pacific island or to remain in Nome and start a business that has interested them since their arrival in Alaska; dealing in Eskimo arts and crafts. The spell of the Arctic won out.

"Our decision was made easier because of our personal association with many of the artisans," Corrington says. There are no roads linking the Eskimo villages and the airplane is a vital link between the villages scattered along the coastal areas and up and down the rivers, as well as with other parts of the state. "So, Mary's job with the airline allowed her to know most of the people along the Peninsula and I knew many of the Eskimo families through the students who had been enrolled at Beltz.

"Everything we have for sale at the trading post is either brought to Nome by the Eskimos or I fly to the villages to look for it." The Corringtons own a Piper PA-18 "Super Cub" that is ski equipped for winter landing. "We trade strictly in native-made items and deal individually with more than 300 craftsmen in 26 villages all over North-west Alaska," he says.

This means that the majority of their inventory items, ivory carvings, mukluks (Eskimo boots), parkas and paintings, are purchased one at a time. "We do have several carvers who produce on a somewhat regular basis, but even these can't be counted on."

The Eskimos follow a very seasonal life pattern, Mrs. Corrington explains. "When the first white men came to Alaska they couldn't understand why the Eskimos wouldn't appear for work if the geese flew overhead. But to harvest the bounty of the Arctic is a 2,000-year-old way of life for the Eskimo. When summer fishing, fall berry picking and duck hunting or winter seal and caribou hunting call, the carvers may put aside their tools and vanish for weeks at a time."

This hand to mouth pattern is still a major factor in the villages the Corringtons trade with. If an Eskimo feels a need for something, he sits down and carves a piece of jewelry or a figurine from walrus ivory or soapstone and trades his handiwork for a rifle, barrel of oil or whatever he needs.

"Our first year of trading with the villages was a hit or miss situation. If we arrived when a carver was carving we would be offered items for cash or trade, but if we arrived when everyone was hunting, we would return to Nome empty handed. The Corringtons soon learned the pattern of Eskimo life though and rarely returned empty handed. The trading post inventory now amounts to more than $50,000 in native arts and crafts. Also, in addition to the Nome tourist trade, the Corringtons supply pieces to gift shops throughout Alaska and in some areas in the "lower 48."

Besides the prosperity of the trading post, the Corringtons have been rewarded with the friendship and trust of the Eskimos. "They are a fantastic people," Corrington says. "Very real and honest. I can go into a village with $2,500 in cash in a pillow case slung over my shoulder and all the natives know what is in there and it's no sweat."

In addition to their business relationship, Corrington often hunts with the Eskimos in between trading trips. They have taught him to read the ice, wind and currents, all important to living on the Bering Sea. They teach in a casual way but you can learn much from them in their own environment, he says.

As for the future, the Corringtons are planning to build an Eskimo cultural center on a lot adjoining their business/residence. The center will include a museum displaying artifacts dating from 2000 years ago to the present and a full sized Eskimo village.

Although Corrington's occupation has changed since his arrival in Alaska, his interest in education has continued. Now as a member of the local school board, he helps to formulate the policy for the school he once ran as principal. Since his election to the board the school has shifted from a traditional system to a modified open classroom concept with curriculum offerings that relate to Eskimo language, culture and arts. And what about their South Pacific dream? Mrs. Corrington sums it up. "I hated cold weather in Missouri. But I love it living in Nome." □

ANNA

By Jean Stephens

Dr. Harrison was on Campus Nov. 8-10 for the dedication of the new chemistry building and the eighth Midwest Regional Meeting of the American Chemical Society. She spoke on the topic "In Pursuit of Dignity." (See News From The Divisions.)

Dr. Anna Jane Harrison is a beautiful person whose life picture emerges as a direct, deceptively simple drawing.

Make a bold, black stroke to define her professional competency. She received an AB '33, BS Ed '35, AM '37 and PhD '40, all from the University. Now a professor of chemistry at Mt. Holyoke College in South Hadley, Massachusetts, she also is the only woman appointed by President Nixon to the 24-member National Science Board, which sets policies for the National Science Foundation. The fundamental purpose of the Foundation is to strengthen research in education in the sciences by awarding grants and contracts. But outstanding professional contributions are not the primary measure of Anna Jane Harrison.

The subject of the sketch speaks in a low, no-nonsense voice of growing up on an Audrain County farm, and commuting to high school in Mexico, Mo. "My first teaching job was in a one-room rural school, a little white frame building in the corner of a cornfield." Laughing a little, smoothing a fold in a jersey dress with lines as softly disciplined as the character of its wearer, she reminisces about her graduate assistant days at the University, where she "received the magnificent stipend of $550. The men got $500. I guess the department chairman figured it cost more for a girl to live respectably than a boy."

The backdrop of the portrait obviously took form before the days of women's lib. So how did she find her way into what was then largely a man's field? She shrugs, shifts in her chair, thinks quietly for a moment. "You do what you enjoy doing, and what society will permit you — or at least not make it impossible for you — to do."

The way she lives, the people and things that matter, provide lines, angles and form to the total Harrison picture. She likes classical music, opera and art. She also does much gardening of shrubs and perennials: "I'm a farmer at heart." And more of the farm girl shows through when she talks about something she really enjoys — horseback riding.

She doesn't have a horse now, but gets some riding in anyway. "Every two or three years I go on a pack trip to a national forest or wilderness area. I like the diversity of the people there."

She also appreciates the diverse in her daily environment. "My social contacts aren't restricted by disciplines. Some of my best friends are classicists, in English, art, music, biology — a nice cross-section."

Ms. Harrison is one of those rare individuals highly attuned to and appreciative of fellow human beings. She finds that "part of the fun in working with students is that eternal conflict in the individual's struggle to develop. The college students I see are so able, poised, yet desperately needing reassurance both professionally and personally."

She says she's not an idealist herself. "I don't expect perfection. You don't have to have an ideal organism to have it function efficiently!" Nonetheless, she enjoys the "idealism of young people. They seem to have rejected the image of success as the acquisition of material goods." On the other hand, she's apprehensive about the existence of student apathy, and is bothered because many students have "such narrow realms of interest. So many simply aren't internationally-minded, and are very self-centered."

It's not surprising that narrowness is abhorrent to a woman like this. The overall portrait, deepened and clarified as she talks, shows an individual who cherishes the flavor, form and textures of living. She responds to life with tolerance and involvement. "Religion? I'm certainly not concerned with the details of any creed but I tend to respect what other people believe in. Homo sapiens have a built-in capacity for reverence. I haven't had time to get too involved in politics, and frankly, this worries me. If you don't contribute more than your vote and financial support, you're copping out, not investing much of yourself. I write letters, persuade other people, about the war, conservation, minority group problems, education . . ."

Now that she's in a position to translate her concern into policy on the National Science Board, what will she do?

Without hesitating, she answers "Work like hell! Most people on the board are research-oriented and not concerned with pre-graduate work. Well, I am." Society is based on science and technology. As citizens, students will be faced with a number of value judgments (pollution, ecology, etc.) that require an understanding of science, she says.

Now that Anna Jane Harrison has filled in the fine lines and shadings of her life picture, what about life itself? She smiles, then quietly replies, "I think it's fun." □

SOUTHWEST HERITAGE

by Mabel Major, AB '14, BS Ed '16, AM '17 and T. M. Pearce

Now in its third edition, this book is a bibliographical guide to the literary history of the southwestern United States. Published by the University of New Mexico Press, it sells for $4.95 in paperback and $12 clothbound. Ms. Major is professor emeritus of English at Texas Christian University.

A HISTORY OF MISSOURI VOLUME II: 1820 to 1860

by Perry McCandless, PhD '53

Published by the University of Missouri Press, this book traces the state's political, social and economic development from the dawn of statehood to the eve of the Civil War. The five-volume history series is an endeavor of the University of Missouri, the University of Missouri Press and a group of historians from the University and several colleges in the state. McCandless is a member of the department of history at Central Missouri State College, Warrensburg. The volume sells for $9.50. Volume I by William E. Foley also is available.

A NEW STORY OF THE BIBLE

by C. R. Talbert, BS Agr '23

After concentrated research in sacred literature, Talbert has constructed his own course of events beginning with Abraham and continuing to the close of the New Testament. Talbert believes that much of the Bible is inspired but that other portions are erroneous. The book is published by Vantage Press, New York.

A MAN ABOUT THE HOUSE

by Ward Dorrance, AB '26, AM '28, PhD '35

This novella, published by the University of Missouri Press, is set in a Missouri town of the 20's. The narrative describes the poignant experiences of a humble workman whose desire for a secure place in his world never reaches fulfillment. Dorrance is professor emeritus of English at Georgetown University, Washington, D. C. The book is available in cloth and paperback editions.

MANUEL GUITERREZ NAJERA:

ESCRITOS INEDITOS DE SABOR SATIRICO, 'PLATO DEL DIA'

by Boyd G. Carter and Mary Eileen Carter

The Carters have compiled as a unit for the first time 264 essays by Najera that were published in a Mexican daily newspaper between April 1893 and January 1895. Najera's importance in 19th century Mexican literature has been compared to that of Poe in American literature. Professor Carter teaches Romance languages at the University of Missouri-Columbia. Mrs. Carter formerly served on the UMC faculty as a teacher of Latin and Greek. The book is published by the University of Missouri Press.

DESIGN FOR A HOUSE

by Johnathan Holden

Published by the University of Missouri Press, this collection of poems by Holden won in manuscript the 1972 Devins Poetry Award. He is currently working on his PhD in English at the University of Colorado, Boulder.

FLIP THAT COIN - WE'RE READY

by Bill Ramseyer, PhD '71

The nitty gritty involved in setting up a high powered 12-month high school football program is explored in this 535 page book, published by Lucas Brothers Publishers, Columbia, Mo. Dan Devine, head coach and general manager of the Green Bay Packers, calls the book "the coach's dictionary, almanac and encyclopedia wrapped into one. Whereas the content deals directly with the high school program, there are organizational and motivational ideas that are applicable to the college or professional coach or even to coaches of other sports." Ramseyer is head football coach at Wilmington College, Wilmington, Ohio.

THE WORLD IN RIPENESS

by H. E. Bates

The concluding volume of his autobiography, this edition recounts Bates' wartime writing experiences, his friendship with Churchill and his later success and failures as a professional writer. Bates is a contemporary British novelist and short-story writer. All three volumes of the autobiography are available from the University of Missouri Press.

THE SIOUX OF THE ROSEBUD

by Henry W. Hamilton, BS Agr '22, and Jean Tyree Hamilton, BS Ed '32

Published by the University of Oklahoma Press, this is the third volume in their "Civilization of the American Indian" series. The authors, through many visits to the Rosebud Reservation in South Dakota, have identified the people and places and events shown in photographs taken by John A. Anderson, army photographer at Fort Niobrara in 1885. Thus they have created a textual as well as photographic history of an area and its people. The book sells for $12.50.

LETTERS

To the editor:

Well, --it finally happened! After more than nine years of receiving and enjoying the Missouri Alumnus, I finally received a copy which did not include a class note about someone I knew personally while on campus. I decided long ago that when it did happen, I would write a letter to the editor to comment about the myth of becoming "lost in the crowd" when attending a large university.

When I was in high school I heard quite a lot about this philosophy of becoming just a "number" among so many students. Many of my classmates would not attend UMC for this very reason. However, I was determined that Columbia was the place for me and I put all such concerns out of my mind.

While I was not unusually active in Campus affairs, I did participate in Newman Club plus some professional societies in the College of Engineering. I also made many friends in classes and in the dorms where I lived. When you consider how small a percentage of each class actually appears in class notes, I find it rather remarkable that it took this long before it happened. I never felt like "just a number" while attending Ol' Mizzou and neither did my friends. Of course, UMC is twice as large now as it was then -- but even so, I feel that it is the students that makes the difference in being known and knowing others, not the size of the school.

I suppose I'm a typical alum in that I always look at class notes first. I'm always amazed at how few notes there are for each class.

By the way, both my wife and I enjoy the present three section format of the Alumnus. Each section has a special appeal--and I think the "Student Viewpoint" section is a nice addition. Keep up the good work!

Eugene M. Sweeney, BS CE '63, MS '68
Peoria, Ill.

To the editor:

What fond and happy memories your article on the Mizzou fight song ("Fight, Tiger," November-December) revived.

The young music student whose shaky voice sang the song, then led the students the first time through those now-famous words was my fiancee--now my husband.

It's still a great song, isn't it?

Helen Hickman Crawford, BS ED '48
Princeton, Mo.

To the editor:

I enjoyed your info-packed article, "Fight, Tiger," in the latest November-

December issue.

The tune is pretty good and seems to grow on you the more you hear it. After all, the tune is about seventy-five percent of any popular song, especially in a football song, whose words are seldom heard.

The lyrics of "Fight, Tiger," however, leave something to be desired, in my opinion.

For example: "Right behind you, everyone is with you." Here, you're asked to be in two places at once -- "behind" and "with." Also, "everyone" is stilted, as though we're fighting fiercely for Harvard or politely applauding at a cricket match by the Thames. What's wrong with good old "everybody's with you"? That's the way we say it in Missouri!

"Break the line and follow down the field, --." Why so circumspect? Besides, when a Tiger "breaks" the line, he's on the offense, not just "following!" Much better would be: "Smash their line and charge on down the field" . . . In any case, something stronger is needed here.

"Upon the top." Gramatically correct, perhaps, but terribly awkward. Instead of having us figure out whether he means "upon" (one word) or "up on" (two words), why doesn't he just say, "way up on top"?

"You will always win; -- ." Very flat! Besides, it just ain't so. That's biting off a bit too much, even for a football song. Something like, "you will win the fray" focuses more appropriately on the game at hand and has more spirit to boot.

In all fairness, the rest of the lyrics are excellent. It is a good over-all job.

I'm not suggesting that Mr. MacKay's first prize be taken back; I think he earned it. However, the tune of the Mizzou fight song deserves the best words it can get.

Also, now that we've named the playing field at Memorial Stadium "Don Faurot Field," we should consider what we are going to name after Dan Devine.

Devine's 13 years at Missouri should certainly not go unrecognized. He imbued a winning spirit and achieved a won-lost record -- both in scheduled and in postseason games -- second to none in Mizzou history, at least in modern football. While credit for that record has to be shared among all the coaches and all the players, it was Devine, probably, who gave that extra inspiration and leadership so necessary for those good winning percentages, which can't be taken for granted.

William R. Etheridge, BS BA '39
Arlington, Va.

To the editor:

I am still staring at your "Let us hear from you envelope." So just a few thoughts.

A fairly recent article in the Missouri Alumnus ("The Stwash Days," September-October issue) concerning "old times" on the Campus intrigued me --yet I predate the times discussed. There was no mention of the old Missouri Store or Jimmie's College Inn where chocolate milk was the popular drink. During my time in Columbia only one student had a car! We didn't even have bicycles.

My only reason for writing is that any news of 1916 and earlier years has almost disappeared. Of we oldsters the occasional news is usually a death -- living in itself, of course, is a part of living.

While I thoroughly enjoy each issue of the Alumnus, in reality it records an almost unreal world. If I should visit the Campus now I would be in a world of fantasy -- everything would be so different. You see, in the years I spent at M.U. we could make it through the school year on as little as $500.

Enough of the days that are gone forever. There are a few (and very few) of us still left. We have nothing of interest to offer the more recent students, but we enjoyed our student years.

Best of luck to the Alumnus.

Glenn H. Doughty, BJ '16
San Clemente, Calif.

To the editor:

Fred McClaskey's letter about Don Faurot's first game with Iowa State in '23 left out an important detail. It was raining cats and dogs at Rollins Field and the small group of rooters was soaked to the skin. Faurot at that time was somewhat of a campus glamour boy as captain of the basketball team. But when Coach Gwen Henry put him in as a "dark horse" everyone was surprised at his gridiron skill, especially the opponents. Anyway, the most unusual aspect of that vivid game, to me at least, was old Jupiter Pluvius who had no mercy.

Albert S. Keshen, BJ '27
Flemington, N.J.

To the editor:

Your yarn on Mr. Rabenberg (News About People--November-December) was quite well-done and interesting.

But, this "tons of steel" bit . . . come, now! You are writing about airplanes, not battleships or locomotives.

For your archives, be apprised from another pilot that even in the earliest days airplanes were constructed of the lightest weight steel tubing covered with wood and/or fabric. For quite some years the structure has been virtually all aluminum.

Mike Angelo, BJ '37
Boonville, Mo.
