MARTY STEVENS/2

THE GIRL IN THE RED FLANNEL JACKET

In 1919, America was singing "How Ya Gonna Keep 'Em Down On The Farm?" Now, more than a half century later, the trend may be starting in the other direction. Disillusioned city dwellers are migrating to the country. Some go to join communes and grow organic foods, while others go to escape the urban traffic and pollution. Marty Stevens differs from those who have moved to the country to enjoy the "pure life." Living alone on 100 acres of Maine farmland, she takes her land, her crops and her animals seriously.

Thirty-three years separate the Marty of Cornville, Maine, from the Marty who was born and raised on Chicago's South Side and who spent ten years in New York as an off-Broadway director, part-time actress, weekend theater manager and ghetto schoolteacher. Now instead of sipping an after-theater drink at midnight, she is pulling on a red flannel jacket and going off to the barn to care for a sick cow.

But the transition from city girl to New England farmer was not an easy one. She spent hours in her cellar just learning how to stoke a coal furnace. She planted her first garden too late for the northern country and she thought you could rent a cow.

The first time Marty had ever seen a tree up close was when she studied radio-TV journalism and theater at the University of Missouri-Columbia. "I think Columbia really triggered my feelings for small-town America," she says. But Marty had aspirations to be a director. After graduation with a B.J. in 1959, she took off for New York.

She made the rounds of NBC, CBS and Time-Life with no luck. She got a job as a secretary and spent her off hours off-Broadway. "I finally devoted my full time to the theater and went broke," she says. In 1963, she landed a job in the New York office of the Skowhegan, Maine, School of Painting and Sculpture. "I went to the Maine campus for the summer and fell in love with it."

That was the beginning of Marty's summers in Maine. The next year she rented a farm there. Later she purchased an old schoolhouse for a summerplace.

In the meantime, she had taken some education courses and started teaching math and English in a Puerto-Rican-black ghetto. "It was one of the most despairing things I've ever done. The kids didn't have a chance. They were damned. Some of them were making $300-400 a week selling drugs. How could I tell a kid like that that you need an education to succeed? I was a good teacher but not a good fighter. I asked myself if I could drive myself to the point where I could succeed and the answer was no."

Disillusioned with New York, she bought her 100-acre farm in Cornville and moved to Maine. "Some of the local people thought I was crazy, a city woman alone trying to farm." But an 83-year-old farmer, Zelot Kincaid sort of adopted her. He showed her how to repair the porch on her 200-year-old farmhouse, where to put the bearings for the barn, and how to smoke butchered pigs.

With the help of neighboring farmers, plumbers, county extension workers, and a little bit of trial and error, she has made a living for three years off the rough New England countryside. "Now I grow everything I need. The only necessities I buy are coffee and cigarettes."

"I don't miss New York at all. Maybe, it's because the problems of dealing with this kind of life (repairing the barn, making your own butter and cheese and caring for the crops and animals) are so overwhelming there isn't time for anything else." It takes Marty three hours a day just to feed her two horses, six sheep, and assorted numbers of cattle, geese, ducks, hens, goats, dogs and cats.

Some people come up here wanting to live a rustic life and to be creative, to paint or write at the same time, she says. It seems there is never time for both though. "Up to this point, being able to supply all of my own needs has been enough of a creative outlet for me."

Her only income is the money she makes teaching welfare recipients subjects they need to get their high school diplomas. "I sell a few things from my garden and some butter, eggs and cheese too," she says. Marty also breeds and sells a few animals now and then. "The farm is not a profit maker, but my profit is the self-satisfaction I get from living here."

"I'll never go back to the city. There is such impermanence there. You teach a kid you'll never see again. You redo your apartment and the building is torn down. But here, when you see the cut nails a person dropped 200 years ago and you see the apple trees he planted and you know the flies bit him just the way they bite you when you're planting your own trees — well, you know you're a link between the past and the present and the future." □

Attend The DON FAUROT LUNCHEON

A luncheon and ceremony will be held prior to the November 25 Missouri-Kansas football game to honor Don Faurot. The program will pay tribute to Faurot, long-time University athletic director and football coach, for whom the playing field at Memorial Stadium is named.

The luncheon will begin at 11 a.m. in the fieldhouse area of the Warren E. Hearnes Multipurpose Building. A brief program, with Jean Madden, former alumni activities director as master of ceremonies, will follow the luncheon.

The field ceremony will be at 1:18 p.m. and will feature the presentation to Faurot of a replica of a plaque to be placed on a gate-like structure at the southwest corner of Providence Road and Stadium Boulevard.

The plaque will give highlights of Faurot's career and will be installed between two large stone columns. Smaller stone columns on either side of the structure will support signs listing current and future football schedules. The structure will be similar to the old Rollins Field gate.

As an additional memorial, the Faurot Testimonial Fund has been established and contributions are invited.

Tickets for the luncheon are $3.50 each and can be purchased through the Alumni Association. The University also is accepting contributions to the Faurot testimonial fund.

Luncheon reservations will be accepted until November 13. No deadline has been set for contributions to the fund.

WILLIAM RABENBERG:

THE FLYING BANKER

By Betty Brophy

The harried businessman, with ulcers, short temper, and no time for family life or hobbies, may be the stereotype of a hard-driving executive. But William V. Rabenberg, a slim, clear-eyed, youthful 61-year-old St. Louis banker, changes the picture. In addition to a successful banking career and happy family life, Rabenberg has flown more than 600,000 miles in 34 years of pleasure flying, including a recent 16,000-mile solo flight over South America.

With "flying high" as a hobby, Rabenberg is down to earth in business matters. For 11 years he worked for a national investment company and then began his own loan firm, which merged a decade later. Rabenberg became president and chairman of the board of Maplewood Bank and Trust Company in St. Louis County. Recently, he sold this interest and is now actively engaged in forming a new bank in Ladue, Missouri. A past president of the Associated Bankers of St. Louis and St. Louis County, Rabenberg is involved in countless community activities, including United Fund, YMCA, Better Business Bureau, and school associations.

While preparing for this successful career, flying was always somewhere on Rabenberg's mind. As a child, he bicycled long miles to the St. Louis airport to observe the fascinating feat of tons of steel defying gravity to rise above the clouds. If he just happened to have the required $2, he would even take a flight now and then.

Air activities around Columbia interested Rabenberg during his University years, 1930-36. It was a quiet, pleasant time, although during the depths of the depression, and fewer than 3,000 students were enrolled. Rabenberg pursued a law degree, not to become a practicing attorney, but because he felt it would help in any career.

It wasn't until his first job stationed him in Springfield, Illinois, that Rabenberg actually took over the controls of a real plane. As was his customary habit, Rabenberg spent a great deal of time at Springfield's small airfield. A stranger happened by one day, looking for a buyer for his Curtiss Junior, an open cockpit, high-winged contraption with engine and propeller in rear. The asking price was $350, which Rabenberg had.

Then, Bud Fleck, the owner of Springfield's airfield and a friend of the businessman, "offered to have someone teach me to fly if I would do it as a publicity stunt. It took eight hours of lessons in order to solo, but nobody had ever done the whole thing in one day."

It wasn't an easy day for Rabenberg, and the task took on even greater import when he realized the meaning of "publicity stunt." "A crowd began to gather on the field," recalls Rabenberg. "I didn't even allow myself time to think about it. They were setting up cameras on tripods. I knew they intended to get a story one way or another."

The novice rose to the occasion, and after his instructional period, he soloed successfully right before sunset, amidst clapping and cheering from the admiring crowd. The airport owner got his publicity, too. Even Rabenberg's hometown St. Louis newspapers picked up the story.

The Curtiss Junior is gone today, replaced by a blue and white Cessna 310-J with which the pilot has flown twice to Alaska (14,000 miles), circled the Caribbean and Central America and flown to Mexico and the West Indies for a total of more than 3,000 hours in the air.

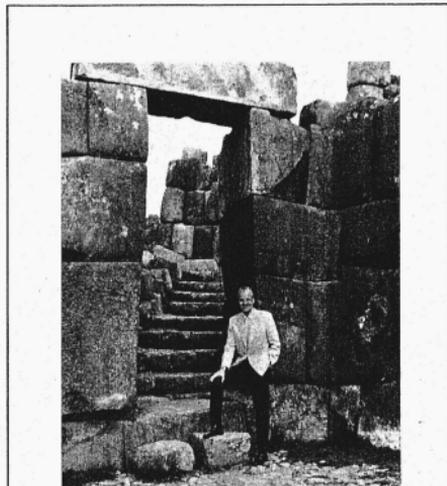

The most recent trip, in February of this year, took him over South America in 25 days. A month of detailed planning, filling six legal-size sheets of paper, preceded the trip — to New Orleans, across the Gulf of Mexico, through Central America, and down the Pacific Coast of South America, and up to 20,000 feet in the air to such exotic places as the lost city of Machu-Picchu, Iguazu' Falls, Copacabana Beach and Sao Paulo.

It was the rainy season in South America, which luckily had little effect on the trip, except for one turbulent period from Sao Paulo, Brazil to Iguazu' Falls. Brazil law required Rabenberg to hire a co-pilot, who turned out to be a bearded, Hemingwayesque fellow, as Rabenberg says, "A nice guy but he didn't do anything at all. And I had to buy him an airline ticket back to Sao Paulo."

Rabenberg's modus operandi on such flights is to take photos (over 300 on this trip), and enjoy the scenery. "I never get bored. I truly enjoy it, and find every minute is fascinating. It's the best way I know to relax."

The trip could be deemed a rousing success, despite the fact that Rabenberg was inefficient enough to arrive back in St. Louis a full two minutes before his yellow legal pads told him he would.

Behind every happy banker-pilot there is, naturally, an understanding lady. In Rabenberg's case it is his vibrantly attractive wife, Ruth, who stayed home with their son, 8, and daughter, 10, with the stipulation he call them every night, no matter where he was. "I guess she figures I was flying before I ever met her," Rabenberg mused. The patience and understanding paid off when the family of four traveled to Europe this summer. □

The ranch staff works hard to maintain a family atmosphere, from the flowers on the dining table to the major administrative decisions.

The school bus pulled up in front of the 20-room, gray, stone ranch house and the boys piled out. Some hurried to the kitchen for an after-school snack. Others plopped down on a couch in the TV room. One boy rushed outside to ride one of the ten horses kept at the ranch, while another stopped to play with the "family" cat. This easy-going way of life is the key to the Butterfield Boys Ranch and to Tom Butterfield's philosophy on foster care.

"We try to keep the atmosphere as close to a normal home setting as possible and away from the cool custodial care practiced in large institutions," Butterfield explains. "I don't think there should be more than 25 young people at any one ranch. It becomes too impersonal." Because of this size limitation, the two Butterfield ranches are forced to turn down hundreds of applications each year. But, Butterfield hopes to eventually open small group treatment settings all over Missouri.

The original ranch, founded by Butterfield in 1963, is located in a building that once housed a Marshall country club, but is now home to 12 boys. A second unit, housing eight boys was opened in July, 1971 in a residential area in Marshall, a central Missouri community about 60 miles west of Columbia. "Someday we are going to build a ranch for girls too," Tom says.

A 32-year-old bachelor with a masters in social work from the University of Missouri-Columbia, Tom is executive director of Butterfield Youth Services, the non-profit corporation that administers the ranches and raises the funds to support them. The tall, lean, redhead also serves on the Governor's Committee on Children and Youth and the Missouri Law Enforcement Task Force on Juvenile Delinquency-Subcommittee on Diagnostic and Institutional Services.

"I really started out to be a teacher and athletic director," Butterfield recalls. As a student at Missouri Valley College, though, Tom got involved in volunteer work at the state hospital at Marshall. "I became friends with an eight-year-old boy who had been committed for shelter care because there wasn't any other place to put him. He wasn't a delinquent or mentally retarded. He was just a slow learner whose father was dead and whose mother was an alcoholic."

Butterfield got permission from the superintendent for the boy to stay with him during the summer and in the fall the boy begged to stay on. "I really didn't know what to do. I was twenty-one, a junior in college and working my way through school. But, I couldn't let this kid go back to the hospital and live with grown men, many who were not even aware of their own existence."

Butterfield's sister, Peggy, provided the answer. She was a freshman at Missouri Valley that year, and she and Tom rented a house and cared for the boy. By the end of the year they had been licensed by the Missouri Division of Welfare as foster parents. "We were the original odd

BUTTERFIELD RANCH

20 BOYS
HOME

Janette Wellman, AB '72, a new counselor, reports about her day.

"I'd like to spend my time at the ranch, but I'm tied up at the office doing paper work, fund raising and staff training."

"The most important thing we can do for these kids is care about them and to treat them with dignity."

couple," Butterfield says.

By graduation, Tom was persuaded to take in another boy, a six-year-old who had never known a real home. "At that point, I had to decide what I was going to do with my life," he says. "Was I going to take in homeless kids and try to help them or was I going to be a teacher?" The kids won out. Tom began to speak to local groups to raise funds for a foster home. With the help of an advisory board, he found a building to house the first Boys Ranch and began to build a staff. He also started work on his masters. Today the ranch has grown into a place where Butterfield can put into practice his own philosophy on child care.

"We try to make the boys and the staff at the ranch as much of a family unit as possible," he explains. The staff, counselors with undergraduate degrees in social work, get involved with the boys' lives and they share their experiences as any family living together does. The boys attend local churches and schools. "There is even a full-time counselor that works strictly as a liaison between the school district and the ranches. She helps the boys with study problems and provides vocational counseling.

"The boys are well accepted in Marshall. We are always running them into town for Boy Scouts, church groups, basketball practice or school events. I think they need to lead a life like any normal boy."

"Even though most of the boys think of the ranch as home, we don't try to take the place of the parents. We have a social worker who goes out into the community to counsel the families. We hope that eventually the family situation will improve to the point where the child can return to his home or if that's not possible, that we can find a foster home that will accept the child. In the meantime, the Ranch serves as a temporary home for the boys to grow and mature in. I believe our small group setting combines the professional counseling of the large institution with the love and family atmosphere of the foster home."

In most large institutions, the children are never given a choice. They all live by predetermined rules handed down by aloof supervisors. "You can't expect a child to automatically become a responsible adult at 18 if he never has the opportunity to be involved in decision making," Butterfield explains. At the ranch, the boys are encouraged and required to assume various responsibilities which carry corresponding privileges. "In other words, the more responsible the boy acts, the more privileges he receives.

"The most important thing we do at the ranch, however, is to give these boys love and understanding. We never give up on a boy. There is nothing a boy can do that is so bad that we will send him away. Once he comes here it is his home no matter what." One boy ran away twice and stole cars, but each time Tom was able to persuade the judge to let him return. "He turned out to be one of our finest boys," Tom says. □

LETTERS

To the editor:

Congratulations to the Missouri Alumnus on its 60th anniversary. I enjoyed the recent issue very much, especially Ed Weatherly's "The Swish Days" as I was a student then.

In Lincoln I am daily confronted by red stickers and signs so I was pleased to see a picture of the tiger on one of the covers.

Keep up the good work!

To the editor:

In the item headed, "Dial-A-Doc . . ." (p. 15, Sept.-Oct. "News from the Divisions"), the headline was not only misleading, it was wrong.

The system is not meant to substitute for a doctor, but to acquaint the public with facts and information about various diseases. The Audio Message Center provides this kind of information for anyone who wants it -- free.

Messages can now be dialed in the Columbia area. We hope by January to have a statewide free program worked out.

By the first of the year, the system should contain well over 100 health messages.

To the editor:

I thought I might take this opportunity to say that I enjoy reading the Missouri Alumnus. I find the "News About People" first on my reading list.

I've got a question about UMC. Who came up with the name for the Warren E. Hearnes Multipurpose Building and when will a real name be given the building?

Iowa State has a large building intended for more or less similar uses named the Coliseum. Even if this title isn't exactly correct, it certainly sounds better than the Warren E. Hearnes Multipurpose Building.

To the editor:

The Missouri Alumnus is excellent reading and I think great journalism. I found the last issue especially interesting because of the article about Don Faurot (p. 2, "News About People").

William R. True, M.D., AB '39
Monterey, Calif.

To the editor:

I have always enjoyed the Missouri Alumnus. It has been almost my sole contact with the University, where I enjoyed four of the most exciting and outstanding years of my life.

The September-October, 1972 issue was of special interest to me. I am inspired to write mainly because of three features:

1. "Let Us Hear From You" envelope.
  2. "The Swish Days" by Edward H. Weatherly.
  3. "Faurot Field".
- The envelope was the "Power of Suggestion."

The "Swish Days" covered my four years at the University -- 1922-26. Ed was in my undergraduate class.

"Faurot Field" recalls my association and friendship with Don during those years. It refreshes my memory of a story that may not be generally known or remembered, about his first involvement in football.

He, as a senior, and I, as a sophomore, were roommates at the Farm House Fraternity, then at 414 Hitt Street, for the 1923-24 school year. Don was to be captain of the 1924 basketball team and was concerned about getting in shape for that. He proposed, and I agreed, that both of us go out for football. I had played high school football.

I didn't come close to making the team, but Don, who had never before at any time tried out for or played football, wound up on the team.

To make a long story short, Don wound up not only getting in shape for basketball, but due to an emergency, getting into the first game of the 1923 football season -- Missouri vs. Ames, as Iowa State was known in those days. He didn't even know the signals.

An unusual beginning, perhaps not generally known or remembered, to the well known career and accomplishments of a most remarkable man.

Faculty - Alumni Awards

Eleven alumni and 12 faculty members were honored at the fifth annual presentation of the Faculty-Alumni Awards September 29 in Columbia. The awards are among the most prestigious of those made by the Alumni Association.

The program included a reception at the Chancellor's residence on the quadrangle and a dinner at the Memorial Union that night. The awardees also were announced at the Missouri-California football game September 30. Several of the divisions held brunches, luncheons or receptions for honorees from their schools or colleges.

The recipients received framed citations and antique gold medallions. Their names also have been added to a large wall plaque that explains the awards and lists all the recipients. The plaque is installed in the north wing of the Memorial Union.

The purpose of the award program is three-fold:

- To recognize achievement at all levels by the faculty and alumni. Assistant, associate, and full professors all are considered for their work as teachers, researchers, and administrators. Alumni of all age levels are considered for both their potential and actual accomplishments in professional life and in service to the University.

- To focus attention on these persons, their accomplishments, and their relationships to the University and on the relationship between faculty and alumni in promoting the best interests of the University.

- To bring together the recipients, their colleagues, and other University and alumni leaders to express the pride and appreciation of the Alumni Association for these people and for the principle of service to higher education.
