This is an archival accounting study that tests whether audit firms make similar mistakes in disclosure reviews among their clientele. Prior literature has taken a very positive attitude toward auditor policies and procedures that standardize audits and increase quality. I document that such policies and procedures have a trade off in that they propagate similar errors throughout a clientele. This is the first study to suggest that auditor policies and procedures may have drawbacks for the clients/audit firm.