ONE DAY IN THE LIFE OF OL' MIZZOU

On Tuesday, September 9, eight professional photographers and 20 photo students worked from midnight to midnight to show Campus Alumni and friends a typical day at Ol' Miz-zou. About 300 of the 4,000 images they recorded were made into a film to be shown soon at alumni meetings. Twelve of those 300 pictures are presented here to show you part of what happened on that Tuesday.

The day began atypically as 3,000 fans mobbed the Columbia airport to greet the Tigers after their victory at Alabama. The Medical Center emergency room was busy during the early morning, as it often is. At 4 a.m. a researcher in plant pathology worked as usual on delicate experiments involving single plant cells while a Campus worker read an old newspaper during a break between rounds at the power plant.

At 7:25, just after the sunrise, Chancellor Schooling walked to his weekly breakfast press conference at the Memorial Union cafeteria.

Later in the day, Professor David Hoepfner engaged in an impromptu eyeball-to-eyeball discussion with students in the engineering building.

A group of students toured the art history and archaeology museum, now in new quarters in the renovated chemistry building on the Quad.

At least one coed gave her best effort in the shot put event during the women's intramural track meet held at 4:30 in the football stadium.

Many students still fight hard to uphold Mizzou's fame for beer consumption. These warriors paused for a portrait on the battlefield.

Weeknight partying is a luxury for most students. On September 9, Ellis Library was the quietest and the busiest student hangout in town.

Combining business and pleasure, one couple converted the living room of the Delta Delta Delta sorority house into a semi-private study hall.

Near midnight, the engineer watched the disc jockey cue up the last album for "The Last Radio Show" at KBIA, the FM radio station in Jesse Hall.
