Video Summary

Anticipating a sparse general audience for my project report considering its length, I elected to create a video summary of my study utilizing interview footage in accordance with the release forms they have signed. I reviewed my project report for passages of quotations that I used as evidence for an argument, edited the passages into a video summary which reviews my major findings per research question, as well as the compelling participant responses that demonstrate my findings.

The video is 30 minutes in length, and uploaded onto a currently (as of April 24, 2022) unlisted YouTube page (in hopes of saving the University of Missouri's limited hard drive space) where it can be viewed with subtitles in its entirety. The following link will remain active continuously through public release after which it will become a publicly searchable video. In the event that this link is ever broken, please feel free to contact me by my email (below) to have it restored.

While I'm happy to release the video for the University of Missouri's academic needs, I also reserve the copyright for myself should I wish to take down, alter, or redistribute my video. That said, I wouldn't have spent as much time and energy as I did on this capstone if I didn't believe in the topical matter's importance to the Journalism Industry. I hope to start necessary conversations and therefore encourage the University of Missouri to share and utilize my content in pursuit of this goal.

It's been my pleasure to present BIPOC Journalists after George Floyd and News Media's Racial Reckoning. The following link will open your default web browser to view the video.
