

Forum generates ideas on athletics

Forum produces opinions about solutions to Athletic Department problems.

A plea to maintain the diversity of sports and possible solutions for Athletic Department budget woes were presented to the Intercollegiate Athletics task force at its Feb. 14 public hearing at the Alumni Center.

"In general I think our hearing was very positive," says Neil Meador, professor of agricultural engineering and task force chair. "I think the public produced some very thoughtful ideas."

Although many of the ideas have been considered by the task force, says Meador, they will still be useful. On Feb. 28, the task force will meet to finalize recommendations for Chancellor Barbara S. Uehling. The report is due March 7

Meador had asked task force members to outline alternative funding solutions for UMC athletics before the hearing and use information gained from the hearing to make mod-

A coach, alumni, students, faculty, Columbians and athletic boosters spoke at the hearing.

Rick McGuire, women's track and field head coach, suggested a stabilized budget for all sports that would be adjusted for inflation. Surplus funds resulting from financially successful years, he says, should be put back into academic programs so all students could benefit from intercollegiate athletics. Conversely, in lean years, University administration would have to help fund athletics. He also asked the task force to consider a funding process that would allow students, faculty and staff to enter any athletic event simply by showing their identification card.

McGuire maintained that non-revenue sports, such as wrestling, gymnastics and baseball, are essential to the University because of high visibility created by clinics and sports camps held by UMC coaches across the state.

David Rogers, a Columbia attorney, offered a plan to lower student, faculty and staff football season tickets to $20 and have the University underwrite the difference. The 1985 prices were $45 for students and $62.50 for faculty/ staff.

This method, he says, would provide an infusion of money to the Athletic Department, increase attendance and increase school spirit by making football more appealing to these important constituencies. Rogers also suggested that no athletic scholarships be offered to out-of-state athletes participating in non-revenue producing sports. All UMC sports except football and men's basketball are considered non-revenue producing.

non-revenue producing. Missouri Students Association President Brad Scott voiced concern over rumors of increased student activity fees to fund athletics. If that's what is necessary, he says, do it by a student referendum. Currently, none of the $39 fee goes to athletics.

Former Columbia Quarterback Club President John Cleek suggested parking fees for football and basketball games, a common practice at other universities. Parking revenues could be put back into the athletic program. Other suggestions included:

• Create a new football season ticket policy to attract more season ticket holders.

• Use University general operating funds to finance the athletic program until it can fund itself again.

• Schedule stronger non-conference home football opponents to increase attendance.

Concern for students thrives through award Mick Deaver Award honors staff who demonstrate special gift for relating to students. on. Deaver, BS Ed '66, was associate director of University Police at the time of his 1980 death in an automobile accident. The Mick Deaver Memorial Award will be presented during Staff Recognition Week March 31-April 3 to a staff member who best exemplifies Deaver's gift for fostering good relations with students. Staff Advisory Council established the award in 1980.

Mick Deaver's concern for students lives

"He had the ability to communicate with anyone," Don Graham, associate director of Residential Life, said of Deaver. As the 1982 recipient of the Deaver award, Graham won praise for his own communication skills.

"I have never seen a person who has exhibited in his work with students so much empathy, humor, patience and the ability to make students assume responsibility," wrote one of Graham's nominators.

The 1985 Deaver award winner was Frank Roberts, who retired last fall as associate director of Admissions. "We're the ones who can make Mizzou's programs, facilities and people accessible."

"Just having Mick Deaver's name on an award makes it very special to me," said Suzanne Holland, assistant vice chancellor for Student Services and director of Student Development, when she received the award in 1983. Diane Brukardt, director of Student Health Services, said of Holland, "She is able to blend a satisfactory combination of empathy for students with a consistent regard for the rules and regulations of the University."

The 1984 Deaver award recipient was Marty Lee, a former administrative secretary in education study advisement. Her philosophy: "Remember that students are the most important people we see."

Retired Ellis Library security guard Blanche Oliver won the award in 1981. "Many times students will seek her help," nominators wrote. "She always finds time to listen to them attentively."

Nominations of staff for the 1986 Mick Deaver Memorial Award are due March 5. Send letters of nomination to Donna Turner, Missouri Testing and Evaluation Services, 403 S. Sixth St.

Dilemmas of working parents

The frustrations and dilemmas of the working parent were highlighted during a Feb. 13 working-parent seminar.

Training Associate Beth Page discussed methods of improving time-management skills for on-the-go parents. The seminar was sponsored by UMC Training and Development.

"If you're working 60 hours a week, raising six kids and trying to have six volunteer community involvements, the obvious answer to your problem is to go back and drop some of your commitments," Page told a gathering of about 30 working mothers and one working father. "But the answers to many time-management problems are less obvious.

"Some working mothers are afflicted with the 'super-parent syndrome," Page says. The syndrome occurs among women who want to have a career outside the home but feel they should also provide their husband and children with all the care of a fulltime housewife.

"The problem is that they realize they can't do both, but they feel guilty about delegating house chores to someone else," Page explains. "Many mothers today were raised with the notion that they can't be good mothers if they don't cook wonderful meals, do the laundry and carry on all the roles traditionally assigned to women." Reassessing personal expectations and priorities can be the first step toward alleviating the syndrome, Page suggests.

Regarding the everyday time conflicts that face almost all working parents, she encourages thoughtful planning as a means to minimizing frustration. "To manage time properly you must clearly define your priorities," Page says.

"For example, if your 'goal' is to be a positive influence on your children, then your 'activity' might be to make yourself available in the evenings for discussion or tutoring."

Seminar participants discussed the task of finding time to meet children's needs and personal needs after coming home from a hard day's work. Among the ideas raised were:

• Hiring someone to help with home and family responsibilities.

• Holding regular family meetings to delegate duties.

• Doing all the cooking for the week at one time.

• Walking downtown during lunch hours to get exercise and run errands simultaneously.

Even after working parents have their priorities defined and their free time well planned, this doesn't always mean they'll get everything done they intended to do, says Page, warning that procrastination often spoils the best-laid plans. "The desire to put things off may be a sign that you're trying to do too much and that you're on the point of burning out. It may be your body's way of telling you to slow down."

At other times procrastination may signal a fear of failure, Page says. "It's important to confront your fears and ask yourself, 'What's the worst possible thing that can happen.' Once you've done that, it helps to remember that motivation is an activity, not just a feeling. If you try doing something for 10 minutes, you'll often find it's not as bad as you thought it would be.''

Future working-parent seminars include "Family Activity Alternatives" Feb. 26; "Enhancing Family Communication" March 5; and "Panel Discussion: How Do Other Working Parents Do It?" April 8. To register, contact Training and Development, 130 Elm Street Bldg., telephone 882-2552.

Council debates award process

Staff Recognition Week topped the Staff Advisory Council agenda Feb. 13.

Gary Fields, mechanical trades specialist in Campus Facilities, reported that some crafts/maintenance employees were concerned about the interviewing and nomination process for the Chancellor's Staff Recognition Awards. Awards of $750 will be presented during Staff Recognition Week to one staff member in each of the four employee peer groups.

Some employees, Fields said, objected to having University police and Campus Facilities workers in the same category, because they believed police were better prepared to speak before a group. The panel interview, they said, was intimidating. One suggestion, Fields said, was to interview the nominator or employee's supervisor instead of the nominee. Finally, some employees objected to some of the interview questions regarding contact with faculty, staff and students.

Toni Gordon, assistant manager of the SameDay Surgery Center, said it was important to interview the nominees. "The nomination forms give more of an indication of how well someone else writes."
